"THE DAMNATION OF FATHER FITZGERALD," IN THE LEDGER NEXT WEEK

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

VOL. XXXV. NO. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., SATURDAY, JUNE 22, 1907. SINGLE COPIES 5 CENTS.

THE DEATH-KEY MYSTERY;

OR, A GREAT DETECTIVE'S RUSE. BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

CHAPTER I.

Richard Zellers, known throughout the world as "Keeneyes the Detective," sat on the front porch of his home in Banks, Mo.

On the front steps sat a young man of about twenty-five. It was a young man who had once given himself up to dissipation, regardless of the opinion of the world and heedless of his own conscience.

Keeneyes had rescued the young man from the slums of the city, and had given him a temporary abiding place in his own house till the former drunkard could feel that he had mastered himself.

The name of this young man was Jansen Moore.

On the particular May afternoon in question, Keeneyes, who had just finished reading a letter, turned to Jansen Moore and remarked, "Another mystery case."

"Will you take it up?" inquired the younger man.

"I will take it up, and I will solve it," said Keeneyes.

Jansen Moore began to whittle. He did not have near so high an opinion of the detective's acuteness as the detective himself had, and it sometimes almost irritated him that in one way or another, Keeneyes always proved correct in his deductions.

"I will take it up," said Keeneyes in rather an aggressive voice, "and when I lay it down there will be no mystery left in it."

Still Jansen Moore whittled in silence.

"Moore," said Keeneyes abruptly, "it has sometimes occurred to me that you do not think the way in which I reach the heart of great mysteries reflects any particular credit upon my intellect."

"Well—" began Jansen Moore. Then he whittled.

"Speak it out," said Keeneyes kindly.

"I think," said Jansen Moore with that positive assurance many people exhibit who do not know what they are talking about, "that while the never-varying success you show in solving these cases is wonderful, truly wonderful, nevertheless it is often, very often, the result of mere chance. You run across certain facts, and when you have enough in your possession, you put them together, just as I might, if I had the facts myself."

"Just as you might, Moore?" repeated Keeneyes suavely.

"Just as I might," Jansen Moore reaffirmed.

"But, my dear boy, don't you remember how complete it was when you were all the time we were investigating that case of the House of the Midnight Sound?

[illegible]es," cried Moore with spirit, "but all the time, even while withholding from me certain facts known to you. Had I known those facts, I should not have been befogged. You once let me know the facts you know, and you'll see me reaching a conclusion as fast as any man."

"As fast as ME?" cried Keeneyes frowning.

"As fast as any man!" Jansen Moore exclaimed.

There was a brief silence. Then the world-renowned detective spoke in a slow, low and impressive tone. "Jansen Moore, I am about to take up a mystery case. I shall keep you from me every fact as I accidentally stumble over it; all that I know about the case you shall know. When I am ready to read from my own inference from the facts in hand, I will warn you. Then you shall form your own conclusion for yourself. When your conclusion is formed as to the heart of the mystery you shall detail it to me. I shall then tell you what I have concluded in regard to the mystery. We will then find which of us is right. The one worsted in this little game of skill shall then perform any act the victorious antagonist may require of him. Is it agreed? We are sure that neither would require any act unbecoming a gentleman."

"I agree to that," Moore exclaimed, "and I shall require you to—"

"I think," Keeneyes remarked dryly, "you had better wait till you have proved your right to make requirements."

Keeneyes took from his pocket the letter he had just been reading.

He said, "I hold here absolutely everything I know thus far in regard to the new mystery. It is a letter from a young lady—"

"Ah!" Jansen Moore exclaimed.

"You are interested already," Keeneyes nodded. "A young lady, I say, named Sophia Le Brune. She lives on Whiteoak Farm—so she has headed the first sheet of paper—Whiteoak Farm, near Peneeville, Nebraska. I received this letter two days ago. All that it has told me I place in your hands."

Keeneyes gave the letter to Moore, and the young man read aloud:

"Mr. Richard Zellers,

Banks, Mo.

"Dear Sir:

"I shall be in Banks, Mo., on the 21st, at which time I hope to be granted an interview at your home. My business will deal with a mystery in the life of our family, of four years' standing. Very truly yours,

"(MISS) SOPHIA LE BRUNE."

Jansen Moore repeated, "Miss Sophia Le Brune. I like that name. And she writes such a good hand, and expresses herself so lucidly, and the note-paper breathes a delicious, almost imperceptible perfume. I shall be more than pleased to meet this young lady."

"I detest perfumery on letters or handkerchiefs," remarked the other. "As to her expressions, I find them far from lucid. She hasn't told us anything she should have told, and much that she didn't mean to tell. For instance, she is an inexperienced child, used to being taken care of instead of looking out for herself. But she writes with a painful straining to appear brief and business-like. There is a mystery in the life of her family. Now, what does she mean by that?"

"If we knew it wouldn't be a mystery," said Moore. "I think that is a capital letter, and if she is unused to the ways of the world I shall think no less of her on that account."

"This is the 21st," remarked Keeneyes, recovering the letter, "and without doubt, yonder she comes!"

The front gate opened and a young lady of about eighteen, entered the yard. She advanced with slightly hesitating steps. She was rather small and her slight body and pretty blonde head made appeal for protection. She sought to appear calm and self-possessed, but the effort so far from being successful, gave a pathetic little touch of helplessness to her general demeanor.

Jansen Moore, at once attracted by her fitting manner, rose quickly from the steps and advanced one step to meet her.

She looked up shyly while her white and pink arms, bare almost to the elbows, trembled with nervousness. "Are you Mr. Zellers?" she asked with a start.

"No, he's not," said Keeneyes, getting out of his rocking-chair; "I am Mr. Zellers."

Jansen Moore got out of the way, feeling somewhat abashed.

"Mr. Zellers," said the young lady, pausing at the foot of the steps, "I am Miss Le Brune, from Whiteoak Farm, near Peneeville, Nebraska."

"Yes," said Keeneyes, "I was looking for you. Will you come in? My wife will be pleased to receive you."

"No," said the lady, "I am here strictly on business. It is kind of you and her, but, no—can we talk here on the porch? I should like that. Will we be secure from interruption here?"

"Quite secure," said Keeneyes. "Pray take this seat."

She ascended the steps then looked doubtfully at Jansen Moore and said, "What I have to tell is in strict confidence as a business lady to her detective."

Keeneyes had never before allowed his services to be taken for granted by a stranger, and he bowed gravely, while Moore could hardly restrain a smile at the phrase "business lady."

Jansen Moore La Brune looked at Jansen Moore.

"Don't mind him," said Keeneyes, "he's my understudy."

"I beg your pardon?" said the lady faintly. Again she looked at the young man to go away. But he was helpless under the rays of her blue eyes.

"He is my assistant, Miss Le Brune," said Keeneyes. "You may trust him as you do me. We work together. He is a sort of medical student assisting at an operation. His name is Moore. Pay no attention to him."

Jansen Moore darted a look of rebuke at his friend, but Keeneyes turned to the lady. "I received your note, Miss Le Brune. It interested me very much. Will you now kindly explain what mystery has been in the life of the family for four years?"

"That is what I am here for, but I hardly know how to begin."

"Oh, then I will help you. You are just of age, are you not?"

"Yes, sir, just eighteen the first of this week."

"So I gathered from your letter. Your father is dead? Do you live with your mother?"

"I do."

"Your guardian didn't want you to spend your money on solving the mystery, I take it," said Keeneyes, "but now that you are of age, you have taken the matter up in spite of his economical prudence."

"You are a good guesser," said Miss Le Brune in astonishment.

"No, I am a good detective. So your guardian's mysteriously died four years ago? What kin was he or she to you?"

"He was my great-uncle."

"Indeed? So your great-uncle died four years ago, mysteriously. Was there no one in his immediate family to take up the matter?"

"My mother and I are his only living relatives. My guardian is not related to his side of the house."

"He was an old man," said Keeneyes. "Had he married a young bride?"

"How could you guess that?" Sophia Le Brune exclaimed.

"It comes so natural to old men," remarked Keeneyes smiling.

"Yes," said the pretty blonde, her face clouding, "he married a young lady not much older than I am myself."

"The widow survives?"

"Oh, yes," said Sophia dryly. "She has married again."

"Was your great-uncle rich?"

"He was very well-to-do; he was prosperous."

"Was his property willed to his wife?"

"It was all made over to her."

"Left unclaimed during his life?"

"But she would not accept it," said Sophia, shaking her golden head. "She offered it all to mother and mother finally persuaded her to accept money for the old farm—it was not near so much as it was worth. The rest all went to charity."

"Why would your great-uncle's wife not receive the property left her?"

"There were remarks," said Sophia.

"I think I can guess," said Keeneyes. "And since then she has married her old sweetheart?"

"It is less than a year ago."

"The former sweetheart was accused of killing your great-uncle?"

"Yes."

"They imprisoned him and had a trial, and then released him?"

"It was just that way. There was no evidence."

"Yes, you think he was guilty?"

"Many in the neighborhood believe it!"

"I take it then that when he married the widow he took her away to live."

"Yes, you think he was guilty?"

"They were sweethearts during her girlhood, before she married your great-uncle?"

"Yes, sir. She was very poor and so was he. They were sweethearts at school. When she married my great-uncle, he went away. He was gone for years. When he came back—well, my great-uncle was killed that very day."

CHAPTER II.

"This," said Keeneyes, "is a very interesting story, but there seems to be nothing new or original about it. Of course, it is the sort of moment when one gets kinked. But in the case of your great-uncle, it seems that he died of a thousand and one such events. Here was a young girl, poor and presumably pretty, in love with a young fellow, poor and presumably trifling and unbusiness-like. Along comes an old man, your great-uncle, with plenty of money. He owns a farm, etc. The poor girl sees a chance opening to her the clouds of poverty. Very good. Excellent. She marries the old man. The poor young chap goes off in the sulks and is gone two years. Comes back one day. Old man is killed the same day. Two or three years pass and then the widow marries her old sweetheart. Is that the story?"

"Just as it happened," said Sophia Le Brune.

"And you want me to find clews to prove the poor man killed his rich old rival?"

"I do."

"But suppose," said Keeneyes, "I should prove that it was not he who killed your great-uncle?"

"But," said the young lady, "how did it happen that my great-uncle was killed the very day the other came back from abroad?"

"But," Keeneyes persisted, "suppose it develops that he really did not kill your great-uncle?"

"If he is innocent," said Sophia, "I shall be the first to rejoice. Your proving it, I want the guilty man punished; but I do not want any innocent one to suffer."

"Good!" cried Jansen Moore, "that is an admirable sentiment."

"Moore," said Keeneyes coolly, "will you please keep off the grass. Well, Miss Le Brune, as to the following-names. For instance, what was the name of your great-uncle?"

"Bolliver Bering."

"Just so. Foresaw," cried Keeneyes. "Why, I read all about that case when the papers were full of it. I have pictures of the handsome old man in room where the murdered man lay, and of the principal hotel in Princeville, the tragedy occurred at Whitecoak Farm—you are living in the very house?"

"And I thought it from that—that woman."

"It was this way, Moore," said Keeneyes, turning to Jansen Moore. "There was a young fellow named Winnie Toppleton, very poor, and strikingly beautiful, in love with a drug store clerk named Phil Deedum. Phil was a pretty good kind of chap, but his father went security for a man that proved dishonest, and when he died Phil shouldered the debt, gave up all he had. Winnie Toppleton said there was no likelihood of Phil making money for some years so she took old Mr. Bolliver Bering while she had the chance. When they married Phil went to Australia, broken-hearted, as he supposed. He stays away two years, living out in the wilds, but making money. He pays off his father's debts, then comes home, still thinking more of Winnie Toppleton than she ever deserved; but that's how it is—she was just so pretty, she couldn't help being charming to look at, and Phil couldn't help looking and being charmed. There is no more praise due her for her looks than blame due him for being a fool.

"Well, he was a moral young man, and meant no harm, but see the sweetheart of his youth 12 days again, he must. So he goes to the old farmhouse carrying a stick—mark the stick well. He has walked out from Princeville—the farm is about two miles out, eh, Miss Le Brune?"

"It is called that, but means farther," said Sophia.

"Of course. Well he is wandering about the country as a pedestrian—nobody has recognized him so far, because he's kept off the roads. Comes to the farm about o'clock. To reduce the matter to mathematical precision, he gets it just four o'clock. Now we are getting this case on a splendid basis," said Keeneyes in manifest enjoyment.

Sophia Le Brune glanced at him reproachfully, for in any way she looked at it, she could see nothing "splendid" in the murder of her great-uncle.

Young Jansen Moore, looking covertly at the young lady, was saying to himself that he had never seen any one more charming.

"At four o'clock, then," Keeneyes resumed, "Phil Deedum, the rejected lover, wanders across the country to the Whitecoak farmhouse, nobody seeing him coming. Now, sometime later, Phil Deedum may appears at another farmhouse about half a mile away, Bering's own. What he says tells the family that on entering the Whitecoak farmhouse, Bolliver Bering, finding lying upon the kitchen floor, dead, Moore, my dear boy, Moore, Moore!" Keeneyes broke off to ask sternly.

"What is it?" said Jansen Moore sternly.

"Why would your great-uncle's wife not receive the property left her?"

"There were remarks," said Sophia.

"I think I can guess," said Keeneyes. "And since then she has married her old sweetheart?"

"It is less than a year ago."

"The former sweetheart was accused of killing your great-uncle?"

"Yes."

"They imprisoned him and had a trial, and then released him?"

"It was just that way. There was no evidence."

"Yes, you think he was guilty?"

"Many in the neighborhood believe it!"

"I take it then that when he married the widow he took her away to live."

"Yes, you think he was guilty?"

"They were sweethearts during her girlhood, before she married your great-uncle?"

"Yes, sir. She was very poor and so was he. They were sweethearts at school. When she married my great-uncle, he went away. He was gone for years. When he came back—well, my great-uncle was killed that very day."

CHAPTER II.

"This," said Keeneyes, "is a very interesting story, but there seems to be nothing new or original about it. Of course, it is the sort of moment when one gets kinked. But in the case of your great-uncle, it seems that he died of a thousand and one such events. Here was a young girl, poor and presumably pretty, in love with a young fellow, poor and presumably trifling and unbusiness-like. Along comes an old man, your great-uncle, with plenty of money. He owns a farm, etc. The poor girl sees a chance opening to her the clouds of poverty. Very good. Excellent. She marries the old man. The poor young chap goes off in the sulks and is gone two years. Comes back one day. Old man is killed the same day. Two or three years pass and then the widow marries her old sweetheart. Is that the story?"

"Just as it happened," said Sophia Le Brune.

"And you want me to find clews to prove the poor man killed his rich old rival?"

"I do."

"But suppose," said Keeneyes, "I should prove that it was not he who killed your great-uncle?"

"But," said the young lady, "how did it happen that my great-uncle was killed the very day the other came back from abroad?"

"But," Keeneyes persisted, "suppose it develops that he really did not kill your great-uncle?"

"If he is innocent," said Sophia, "I shall be the first to rejoice. Your proving it. I want the guilty man punished; but I do not want any innocent one to suffer."

"Good!" cried Jansen Moore, "that is an admirable sentiment."

"Moore," said Keeneyes coolly, "will you please keep off the grass. Well, Miss Le Brune, as to the following-names. For instance, what was the name of your great-uncle?"

"Bolliver Bering."

"Just so. Foresaw," cried Keeneyes. "Why, I read all about that case when the papers were full of it. I have pictures of the handsome old man in room where the murdered man lay, and of the principal hotel in Princeville, the tragedy occurred at Whitecoak Farm—you are living in the very house?"

"And I thought it from that—that woman."

"It was this way, Moore," said Keeneyes, turning to Jansen Moore. "There was a young fellow named Winnie Toppleton, very poor, and strikingly beautiful, in love with a drug store clerk named Phil Deedum. Phil was a pretty good kind of chap, but his father went security for a man that proved dishonest, and when he died Phil shouldered the debt, gave up all he had. Winnie Toppleton said there was no likelihood of Phil making money for some years so she took old Mr. Bolliver Bering while she had the chance. When they married Phil went to Australia, broken-hearted, as he supposed. He stays away two years, living out in the wilds, but making money. He pays off his father's debts, then comes home, still thinking more of Winnie Toppleton than she ever deserved; but that's how it is—she was just so pretty, she couldn't help being charming to look at, and Phil couldn't help looking and being charmed. There is no more praise due her for her looks than blame due him for being a fool.

"Well, he was a moral young man, and meant no harm, but see the sweetheart of his youth 12 days again, he must. So he goes to the old farmhouse carrying a stick—mark the stick well. He has walked out from Princeville—the farm is about two miles out, eh, Miss Le Brune?"

"It is called that, but means farther," said Sophia.

"Of course. Well he is wandering about the country as a pedestrian—nobody has recognized him so far, because he's kept off the roads. Comes to the farm about o'clock. To reduce the matter to mathematical precision, he gets it just four o'clock. Now we are getting this case on a splendid basis," said Keeneyes in manifest enjoyment.

Sophia Le Brune glanced at him reproachfully, for in any way she looked at it, she could see nothing "splendid" in the murder of her great-uncle.

Young Jansen Moore, looking covertly at the young lady, was saying to himself that he had never seen any one more charming.

"At four o'clock, then," Keeneyes resumed, "Phil Deedum, the rejected lover, wanders across the country to the Whitecoak farmhouse, nobody seeing him coming. Now, sometime later, Phil Deedum may appears at another farmhouse about half a mile away, Bering's own. What he says tells the family that on entering the Whitecoak farmhouse, Bolliver Bering, finding lying upon the kitchen floor, dead, Moore, my dear boy, Moore!" Keeneyes broke off to ask sternly.

"What is it?" said Jansen Moore sternly.

"Why would your great-uncle's wife not receive the property left her?"

"There were remarks," said Sophia.

"I think I can guess," said Keeneyes. "And since then she has married her old sweetheart?"

"It is less than a year ago."

"The former sweetheart was accused of killing your great-uncle?"

"Yes."

"They imprisoned him and had a trial, and then released him?"

"It was just that way. There was no evidence."

"Yes, you think he was guilty?"

"Many in the neighborhood believe it!"

"I take it then that when he married the widow he took her away to live."

"Yes, you think he was guilty?"

"They were sweethearts during her girlhood, before she married your great-uncle?"

"Yes, sir. She was very poor and so was he. They were sweethearts at school. When she married my great-uncle, he went away. He was gone for years. When he came back—well, my great-uncle was killed that very day."

CHAPTER II.

"This," said Keeneyes, "is a very interesting story, but there seems to be nothing new or original about it. Of course, it is the sort of moment when one gets kinked. But in the case of your great-uncle, it seems that he died of a thousand and one such events. Here was a young girl, poor and presumably pretty, in love with a young fellow, poor and presumably trifling and unbusiness-like. Along comes an old man, your great-uncle, with plenty of money. He owns a farm, etc. The poor girl sees a chance opening to her the clouds of poverty. Very good. Excellent. She marries the old man. The poor young chap goes off in the sulks and is gone two years. Comes back one day. Old man is killed the same day. Two or three years pass and then the widow marries her old sweetheart. Is that the story?"

"Just as it happened," said Sophia Le Brune.

"And you want me to find clews to prove the poor man killed his rich old rival?"

"I do."

"But suppose," said Keeneyes, "I should prove that it was not he who killed your great-uncle?"

"But," said the young lady, "how did it happen that my great-uncle was killed the very day the other came back from abroad?"

"But," Keeneyes persisted, "suppose it develops that he really did not kill your great-uncle?"

"If he is innocent," said Sophia, "I shall be the first to rejoice. Your proving it. I want the guilty man punished; but I do not want any innocent one to suffer."

"Good!" cried Jansen Moore, "that is an admirable sentiment."

"Moore," said Keeneyes coolly, "will you please keep off the grass. Well, Miss Le Brune, as to the following-names. For instance, what was the name of your great-uncle?"

"Bolliver Bering."

"Just so. Foresaw," cried Keeneyes. "Why, I read all about that case when the papers were full of it. I have pictures of the handsome old man in room where the murdered man lay, and of the principal hotel in Princeville, the tragedy occurred at Whitecoak Farm—you are living in the very house?"

"And I thought it from that—that woman."

"It was this way, Moore," said Keeneyes, turning to Jansen Moore. "There was a young fellow named Winnie Toppleton, very poor, and strikingly beautiful, in love with a drug store clerk named Phil Deedum. Phil was a pretty good kind of chap, but his father went security for a man that proved dishonest, and when he died Phil shouldered the debt, gave up all he had. Winnie Toppleton said there was no likelihood of Phil making money for some years so she took old Mr. Bolliver Bering while she had the chance. When they married Phil went to Australia, broken-hearted, as he supposed. He stays away two years, living out in the wilds, but making money. He pays off his father's debts, then comes home, still thinking more of Winnie Toppleton than she ever deserved; but that's how it is—she was just so pretty, she couldn't help being charming to look at, and Phil couldn't help looking and being

"Not at all," retorted Keeneyes. "These suppositions make it as clear as noonday, that the deed could not have been committed by Mrs. Bering and Deedum in conjunction, else Deedum would have been no discrepancy in regard to where the corpse was found."

"My uncle's body," said Miss Le Brune, "was really found upon the parlor floor."

"And there was no evidence to show it had been first on the kitchen floor?"

"No, sir. But Mr. Deedum's walking-stick was found upon the kitchen floor. That is what led to his being imprisoned."

"But," said Jansen Moore, "why should his walking-stick have been found upon the kitchen floor, if the corpse lay upon the parlor floor?"

"If it comes to that," said Keeneyes, "why was Phil Deedum in that kitchen? Is it customary for a man's unsuccessful rival, after staying out of the country for two years, to come back and enter one's kitchen with one's walking-stick?"

"I am confused," said Jansen Moore.

"Yes," said Keeneyes. "Now, let us consider how your great-uncle was killed. Miss Le Brune. It is a lovely case, no gore. There is no shedding of blood, nothing. What was Phil Deedum in that kitchen? Is it customary for a man's unsuccessful rival, after staying out of the country for two years, to come back and enter one's kitchen with one's walking-stick?"

"I am confused," said Jansen Moore.

"Yes," said Keeneyes. "Now, let us consider how your great-uncle was killed. Miss Le Brune. It is a lovely case, no gore. There is no shedding of blood, nothing. What was Phil Deedum in that kitchen? Neat little wound upon the right temple.—I remember, it was the right temple. I read all this four years ago, and I may have a detail incorrect, but I do not think it is."

"It was the right temple," said Sophia sadly.

"Just so. Good, excellent. It was just such a wound as a walking-stick would have inflicted, was it not?"

"Everybody knew," said Sophia with energy, "that Phil killed my father with that walking-stick. If Mr. Deedum had not used it, that lovely room, the parlor, would first attract the eye of the visitor, whereby Mr. Deedum might have been discovered."

"None," said the young lady.

"You are quite right," said Keeneyes. "I have an impression that another weapon lay upon the floor."

"No, sir, there was nothing but the walking-stick."

"It is singular," said Keeneyes, "but I seem to remember that some other weapon was found."

Sophia Le Brune shook her head with conviction. "No, sir, there was only the walking-stick was the only clew ever discovered."

"Ah, well," said Keeneyes, "now that you have engaged my services, you will soon find that I know more than you will know what to do with. Eh, Moore?"

"Mr. Deedum up," said Jansen Moore, "I shall know what to do with them."

"Ah," Keeneyes smiled, "I have not forgotten our little agreement made just before Miss Le Brune came. But I forget nothing."

"Your great difficulty, Mr. Detective," said Sophia, "is that all this happened four years ago. It will be hard to bring everything home to Phil Deedum. Mr. Deedum has married that—that woman, and they are living in the house. All that they have to do is lie out and we have changed the house a good deal since my uncle was killed. I was a great pet of his. He doted on children. He was killed, but my guardian wouldn't let me see him. He wished, on offering a reward for the conviction of the murderer—"

"Your guardian, I suppose, was as anxious as any one to have the guilty man brought to justice?"

"Oh, yes, but he is very close; he wouldn't let me see him except for necessities."

"Quite proper. Well, Moore and I will come at once to your farm and, in a day or so, we will turn over to you the guilty party."

"Oh, Mr. Zellers! is it possible—"

"Am I to understand," retorted the other; "of course it is possible. All the murderer lives at a distance.—says Thucydides—of course, and must return to it. We travel back and forth. I shall know in a day or two who the guilty party is. Moore, I soon thereafter as trains and telegrams can travel I will put the guilty person in your hands."

"Mr. Zellers," spoke Jansen Moore, "if, as I suppose, you are going at once to a perfectly home, why may we not go with her."

"Why not?" said Keeneyes calmly, "to work with undistracted minds."

"What does that mean?" Moore asked, flushing.

"In there anything else I can tell you, Mr. Detective?" said Sophia, quickly.

"Absolutely nothing."

She smiled at him timidly and said, "After all, it seems that you have been telling me rather than I have been giving you information."

"Oh, yes," said Keeneyes.

She rose.

"Miss Le Brune," said Moore, with becoming gravity, "will you permit me to go with you to your hotel?"

"It is not necessary," said the young lady, "I am stopping at a private boarding house."

"I will go with you to the boarding house," said Jansen Moore firmly.

Sophia Le Brune hesitated a moment, then said quickly, "Very well."

They walked away together. Keeneyes watched them with knitted brows as they swung along the street in fast-growing acquaintanceship. He sighed. "It's a good thing to be young," he muttered, "even if one must be half a fool!"

He noticed that Jansen Moore's head swung on the side next to the young lady, and the young lady's head was set midway, noncommittal.

Keeneyes raised his voice and called, "Henrietta!"

His wife appeared at the front door.

"Come out and sit with me, Henrietta," said Keeneyes; "somehow or other, I'm feeling lonesome."

CHAPTER III.

When Jansen Moore returned from escorting Sophia Le Brune to her private boarding house, he found Keeneyes serenely seated beside his wife upon the front porch.

A general air of contentment and domesticity greeted.

Jansen Moore, however, had no eyes for the domesticity of others. His thoughts were busy with the young lady from whom he had just parted. He sank down upon the porch steps with an air of melancholy abstraction.

"Henrietta," said Keeneyes to his wife, "why is it that the prettier a girl is the sadder it makes a man feel?"

"I don't know," said Mrs. Zellers, "that the subject of pretty girls no longer interests you, Mr. Zellers."

"Such a hope," said Keeneyes gallantly, "appreciates yourself, my dear. But declination though it be to be found in the company of the prettiest of them all. I must return to other and more serious matters to discuss a new mystery case."

Mrs. Zellers, with the neatness and docility that all the wives of Banks, Missouri's cabin will have accepted as a model to imitate.

In fact, Keeneyes never discussed any case with his wife. "One of the detective in a family is sufficient," he sometimes declared, "and this gourmet's longings are not the legitimate sphere of women."

When Mrs. Zellers went back to her sewing, Keeneyes entered the house and sought his private library. One wall of the room was devoted to newspaper clippings, assorted in little boxes, according to the mysterious code with which he dealt.

Keeneyes took down a shallow box upon which was written in a bold hand, "Bolliver Bering."

He took the box out on the front porch. Jansen Moore was sitting there. One glance at it he had not noticed the departure of his host from the house.

"Moore," said Keeneyes, "you remember, no doubt, your old sweetheart, Nell Atkins?"

"Oh, yes," said Jansen Moore, abstractedly.

"You will recall how you and another young man cut you out and marry her off hand."

"Well, well," said Moore, impatiently, "what is it you want me to do?"

"I have a bit of news in regard to her," said Keeneyes, seating himself, "there's a baby."

Jansen Moore leaned forward, pulled up a few weeds and threw them over his left shoulder and said indifferently, "I don't care."

"Now," said Keeneyes, "I have a lady who has brought us our mystery case, this Miss Le Brune."

"Charming girl!" Moore murmured dreamily.

Keeneyes took some papers out of his box and said drily, "Let us attend to business. You four young people go ahead and share alike on the facts in this mystery case of Bolliver Bering. As to inferences to be drawn from said facts, I will try to keep them to himself. Now, you have been handed the facts there in the box. In my possession, except a few illustrations made from woodcuts in the papers at the time of the old man's murder. I am going to show you these pictures and then you will be on an equal footing with me. What is it?"

Keeneyes opened up a roll of four-year-old newspapers.

"There is a great deal of reading matter there, in regard to the case," Moore observed.

"Yes, yes, read it if you choose; but really, everything known about the tragedy might be put in a few lines. The old man was killed the same day that Phil Deedum, his young wife claimed to have come home on a visit to a neighbor—namely, Mrs. Collis.

"She sees the corpse in the parlor and runs back to Collis' house to give the alarm.

"In the meantime, Phil Deedum runs to the Bateses, crying out that he has found the corpse in the kitchen.

"The neighbors are aroused: the corpse is found in the parlor, and Phil Deedum's walking-stick in the kitchen. Those are the facts.

"Deedum is arrested, tried, cleared for lack of evidence, and later he marries the widow marry. Those are the sequels or corollaries.

"Now, observe these pictures, taken a day or two after the tragedy by enterprising reporters. Here is the Peaceful Chargehouse.

"But what has that to do with it?" asked Moore, with a fleeting glance at an old brick building, somewhat unwindowed.

"That you may judge for yourself. Here is a picture of the oldest woman in the county, 102 years old and still spry."

"I have been connected with the case?"

"Many have been connected with it," said Keeneyes. "Here is a picture of the Whitecoak Farmhouse, where the corpse was found."

"Just an ordinary story-and-a-half frame," remarked Moore, "and this is that where Sophia Le Brune lives? It seems a little dilapidated. Those large shade trees are romantic. I am eager to go there."

"You will go tonight. Here is an interior view of the parlor, and this comment indicates where the body was found lying."

"Where the corpse lay with one arm—"

"At last he said. "The artist has failed to catch a clew, if a clew was there."

"Oh, indeed!" said Keeneyes smiling. "Well," said Moore, "you see a clew there?"

"Of course; I do. A remarkable clew. Look at that bench!"

"I see that, too," returned Moore. "There seem to be stains of any kind upon it."

"Stains!" cried Keeneyes, "that, my dear fellow, there was no bloodshed to cause stains. Who is looking for stains?"

"Then, what about the old plaza stead?"

"Notice how far it is from the piano, and how cross-cornered it stands to the rest of the furniture."

Jensen Moore smiled. "People don't always keep their piano stools with their toes marking a line," he said satirically.

"True," said Keeneyes gently. "Hand me back the picture, Moore. I see you are done with it. Now, here is a picture of the interior of the kitchen, taken before it had been altered after the tragedy. This cross-mark in the new Irish Deodora claims he discovered the corpse on coming into the room, and the little circle is where his walking-stick was found lying."

"Ah," said Moore, "the stick was very near the place where he said he saw the old man lying."

"Yes, quite near," Keeneyes agreed.

"If the corpse had really been found there," said Moore, "that would be a damaging bit of evidence. But the corpse wasn't there, you will remember, but in the parlor."

"Then why did Phil Deodum say he saw it there?" demanded Keeneyes.

"That's the mystery," said Moore.

Keeneyes smiled again in that knowing way that was peculiarly irritating to Moore. "Mr. Zellers," he said, "perhaps you find any clews in this picture of the kitchen floor?"

"I find a remarkable clew," said Keeneyes genially.

"You mean the position of the walking-stick?"

"I wouldn't give a straw for that walking-stick. My dear fellow, look over here on the floor, three feet at least from the walking-stick. What is that lying on the bare board?"

"I don't see anything. You don't mean that key, do you?"

"Why, of course I mean the key."

"What of it? What of the key?"

"It will unlock the mystery," said Keeneyes.

"I see nothing peculiar about the key."

"Oh, you don't. Dear me, you have an unusually large to show up in this woodcut!"

"Well," returned Moore, "I've seen much larger keys than that."

"My old comrade," said Keeneyes impatiently, "the question is not what you saw at Sophia Ellis's ball, but what we see in this picture. Now, is not this key an unusually large iron key?"

"It is far than an ordinary house-door key." Moore admitted.

"Very," exclaimed Keeneyes, nodding. "Good. Excellent. Now, old man, how came a key there?"

"How should I know?"

"But infer, Moore, infer, make an inference."

"Perhaps, when the old man was struck down he dropped the key from his pocket or from his hand."

"Then why didn't he drop it in the parlor where he dropped himself?"

"I do not know."

"I think," said Keeneyes, "and therefore, I believe I understand the entire mystery just as thoroughly as if I had made it. The only reason I do not explain it all to you on the spot, is that you have entered upon a career of skill with me, to prove you can detect as cleverly as I. All that remains for you to do is to prove what I infer. I could win the contest even now by explaining my conviction, but that would not be proved correct. But I am going to wait on you. I am going to put the facts in a high under your nose that you will strike it against them in your groppings. I shall give you the positive clews to show your ability; and after this, I trust you will never again insinuate that you, or any other man, is the equal of Keeneyes the Detective."

Mr. Zellers," said Moore, abstractedly, "did you ever see peaches such a heavenly shade of warm blue as that of Sophia Le Brune's eyes?"

CHAPTER IV.

That night Keeneyes and Jansen Moore took the train for Fenceville, Nebraska. We must get on the scene of the tragedy before Miss Le Brune arrives," said Keeneyes, "because as soon as she arrives she will spread abroad the news that she has engaged a detective. She couldn't keep a secret. None of the little women with golden hair can keep a secret."

"I am sure Sophia Le Brune is not like other women," said Moore rather stiffly, "she could keep a secret."

Keeneyes smiled.

"Mr. Zellers, since you think you know all about the Deliver Bolter case, why will he not you explain the mystery four years ago when he was killed?"

"I was consulted. I do not offer my services; I grant them."

It was in the morning when they reached the small country seat of Fenceville. "We will go at once to the law office of J. J. James," said Keeneyes, "he is Miss Le Brune's guardian,—rather was before she reached her majority."

J. J. James, a tall, wiry man of fifty, was found with his office with his heels on the window-sill and his head in a yellow leather-backed book.

"This is Mr. James?" said Keeneyes. "My name is Zellers, and this is my friend Moore. You are engaged?"

"I am, gentlemen," said Mr. James. "I have a case on in a court of hours, and I am looking up some authority. Can you come around this afternoon?"

"No, sir," said Keeneyes, sitting down. "I was particularly anxious to find you engaged right down Moore. When a man is engaged, his brain is at its highest activity, and I want your mind at its highest activity for my business is delicate. So allow me to transfer your interest from your case to mine. I will take but a few moments. I don't like other people's time, nor allow them to waste mine."

J. J. James laid down his book in amazement. "What do you want, sir?" he demanded severely. "You have a peculiar way of approaching a man for favors. Where are you from—Missouri?"

"I don't want any favor," said Keeneyes quietly, "and I'm from Missouri, too. You were Miss Le Brune's guardian. Why did you not allow me to investigate the mystery of her father's death at the time when clews were fresh and interest was most keen?"

"Will you kindly leave my office?" said James rising, "or will you give me the trouble of having you forcibly ejected?"

"I will go without giving you that trouble," said Keeneyes rising, "but you, Moore, I don't know whether he will come away peaceably or engage with you in a struggle."

"Of course I will go peaceably," said Moore, with some indignation. "I had no desire to intrude upon you, Mr. James, and I beg your pardon. I am not responsible for the conduct of Mr. Zellers."

J. J. James bowed frigidly, then glared at Zellers.

"Perhaps I should explain," said Zellers, hastily, "that my friend Moore has come here to Fenceville in the capacity of a detective, and he is very anxious to ferret out that mystery of four years ago. You will have him to reckon with, Mr. James, I warn you, most Goodish sir."

When they had left the office, Moore turned on Keeneyes angrily. "Mr. Zellers," he said with heat, "I do not forget the obligation under which I rest. But I do not understand why you try my self-restraint so severely. You know I am more than interested in Miss Le Brune, and you made me odious to her guardian, and it was entirely gratuitous. You have behaved ill in by it. It was—it was—it was outrageous!"

"My dear and heated friend," said Keeneyes coolly, "it was nothing of the sort. You'll go about the city offering Deodum for pastime? When I do things it is because they need to be done. I have come you to Miss Le Brune's guardian. I have presented you, and it were, with a series of hints. Now infer, Moore, infer."

"I infer—" began Moore. He checked himself, then added in a cold tone, "I infer to express in words what I infer."

"I have presented you the facts," said Keeneyes, "and you are to deduce from them who killed old Bolter Bering. Good. Now some words on the case. I have up some more facts. Let us go to the home of the Bates family in Gull Flats, that we may to the Bateses that Phil Deodum hastened three years ago with the news of how found the corpse in the kitchen."

At a livery stable they secured a buggy, and a half-hour's driving brought them. They drove rapidly in that direction; Keeneyes breathing in the fresh country air with delight, and Moore openly sulking.

At the farmhouse, they found Mr. Bates nearing the end of his meal, so they were spared the pains of driving through the town. His name as the master of their business was explained, and Mr. Bates promptly hinged his knife-blade to tell all he knew, Keeneyes plied him with questions.

Nothing, however, was to be gleaned from the old man's harvest of words, save the information that Phil Deodum had made it the old newspapers. Phil Deodum, supposed by the Bates household to be fishing in Gull Flats, suddenly appeared like a ghost at the side door, saying in an excited voice that he had found old Bering dead, above in his kitchen floor. The family had hurried to the dwelling and discovered that he was there on the kitchen floor. But when appeared dumb-foundered, for the facts as had been able to explain the discrepancy, except by suggesting that some one had come to the house after Phil Deodum and had dragged the body to the parlor.

"I dear Phil," Mr. Bates asked, "should any one do that?"

"Ah, Moore," said Keeneyes, "can you think why?"

"There could be no motive for such a heedless and ridiculous mutilation of the corpse," Moore declared emphatically.

"You're right," said Keeneyes, beating on his fence and bobbing his chin-beard up and down, "and that's why we know that Phil Deodum did not find he see there on the kitchen floor. But we have nothing because they wasn't no witnesses."

"While Phil Deodum was telling you about the discovery of the body in the kitchen, Mrs. Bering was telling the Collises about the murder, and lying on the parlor floor,—eh, Mr. Bates?"

"It must have been along about that there time," said Mr. Bates. "She was telling what she saw; but Phil Deodum, he was telling what he found he was a-telling, nor why on earth he ever told it. If he killed the old man why did he come and tell us he was him on the kitchen floor? And if he killed him in the parlor why was the body found in the kitchen on the kitchen floor?"

"Why was it, Moore?" inquired Zellers respectfully. He added to Bates, "Mr. Moore has come up here to investigate this mystery, Mr. Bates, you know."

"It is very mysterious," said Moore shaking his head.

"Are you a detective?" Bates asked of Moore, with awe.

"He's trying to be," said Keeneyes. "Well, let us be going, unless Mr. Moore desires to pursue this matter further."

As they drove away, Keeneyes remarked, "There are some facts I have presented you with. Now, there is really no use to visit the Collises, for they can only tell us what we already know. Let's go to the court house, and hear J. J. James pleading his case."

"I would rather go out to Whiteoak Farm to see Sophia Le Brune's home."

"But she isn't there."

"Yes, another is."

"I want to hear J. J. James," said Keeneyes. "Now you allow me to loud you up with facts. There are no facts out at that farmhouse,—merely romance."

Moore unwillingly went with Keeneyes to the court house. A case was in progress, but so far from giving it any attention, Keeneyes sat scribbling upon a stray bit of paper. Presently he wrote something in his notebook, tore the page out of the scrap of paper, wrote upon it, "J. J. James, Esq.," and passed it over the lawyer's table.

"Good evil," he said to Moore. When they were outside, the detective said, "If you will go to the hotel, I wrote to J. J. James, because I have promised to keep you stocked with every facts that comes my way."

He opened his notebook. "I will read you a copy of that note."

He read: "My dear Mr. James: You have a friend here in Fenceville with. Allow his friend to advise you that you have to register at the hotel. I will sleep tonight in the barn on Whiteoak Farm. I advise you, before it is too late, to seek an interview with Bering's ward at time between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock. You will be interested with. I am, sir, your most humble servant, RICHARD DUDLEY KEENEYES."

"More evidence," said the detective and was mute.

"Well," said Keeneyes, "what do you think of it? Does it suit you?"

"Suit you!" Moore said indignantly. "Why are you always dragging me into collision with Sophia's guardian? I don't care to have an interview with the man. And how do you know I am going to sleep at Sophia's house? Suppose I am engaged to escort her barn at eleven o'clock at night? And if J. J. James comes to hold the interview, I'll have nothing to say to him."

"Oh," said Keeneyes, easily, "J. J. James won't come at eleven o'clock at night."

"Then why did you write for him to come? Why did you write for him at all?"

"But that is for you to infer," said Keeneyes, "that is a fact. The note was written, and J. J. James has read it. That is the fact. Now grapple with it."

"But you are manufacturing facts that have no bearing on the case," said Moore, much smoldering displeasure. "Suppose I should cuff you on the head and explain that it was a fact. Would that satisfy you?"

"It would satisfy me until I had presented you with a fact in exchange of a kindred nature," said Keeneyes frowningly. "Moore, you cannot possibly know how displeasing it is to me to hear any one talk of facts that I have given him. Infer, infer."

"When do you think Sophia Le Brune will come home?" asked Moore, swallowing with difficulty.

"She will go to my house today," said Keeneyes, "and to-morrow. My wife will tell her I have already come to Fenceville. She will reach here in the morning."

"Then," said Moore, "I shall not think of you to-night. If she were at home, I could not feel as if I were a gentleman while you slept in the barn. You have we to do today."

"Absolutely nothing," said Keeneyes. "I shall write my autobiography. You are at liberty to roam at will."

"Then I will visit Whiteoak Farm; when I think that Sophia Le Brune has passed several hours there, I will call on her to-morrow. I am all eagerness to breathe its atmosphere."

"Now, Moore," said Keeneyes, "if you go out there you'll make some mistake. I'd best go with you."

"No you hadn't," said Moore quickly. "I merely want to look around."

"She knows her father has gone to engage a detective."

"She didn't go to engage you."

"I won't let anybody see me," said Moore, "and if I've seen, I'll simply inquire my way back to Fenceville, or pretend to be a book agent or something."

"I will let you go," said Keeneyes after reflection. "It is a fearful risk, but I don't like to be alone the most of the day. I find in writing my life-work that it is next to impossible to leave out anything that ever I said or did. I would like to choose only the most important next and words, but when I regard my personal history, everything seems important. Now I am at work on a chapter regarding——"

"Yes, yes," said Moore, hastily. "well good-by, dear friend. I will turn up at the hotel sometime about dusk, I imagine."

$8.25 WILL BRING YOU THIS FINE HOPKINS & ALLEN
Military Bolt Action Repeating Rifle
22 Caliber
16 Shots

RIFLE. To the HOPKINS & ALLEN JUNIOR REPEATER—recognized everywhere as the handsomest, best handling, quickest and straightest shooting 22 caliber Repeating Rifle made in America at the price. Shoots 22 caliber short and long rim cartridges interchangeably without change of sights. Shoots 16 22 caliber short and 10 22 caliber long and 22 caliber long rifle cartridges. The slender wrist is the lightning. You can make bull's eyes as fast as you can work the trigger; the appearance of the Gun is something to take pride in.

YOU WILL MAKE NO MISTAKE IN BUYING THIS RIFLE. To the HOPKINS & ALLEN JUNIOR REPEATER—recognized everywhere as the handsomest, best handling, quickest and straightest shooting 22 caliber Repeating Rifle made in America at the price. Shoots 22 caliber short and long rim cartridges interchangeably without change of sights. Shoots 16 22 caliber short and 10 22 caliber long and 22 caliber long rifle cartridges. The slender wrist is the lightning. You can make bull's eyes as fast as you can work the trigger; the appearance of the Gun is something to take pride in.

ACTION is improved Military Bolt Pattern (side ejection) which is recognized as the safest model for a repeating rifle—with a thumb safety device preventing danger of accidental discharge. GUN is 40 in. long, barrel 22 inches—takes down in two parts and can be packed in a knapsack. Materials, Manufacture and Assembling are of Highest Grade Throughout, and the Rifle is Warranted to Give Greatest Satisfaction or Remarkable Reasons for the Price.

Order at your Dealer's or Write us Today. We will send this RIFLE DIRECT TO YOU FOR $8.25—AND GUARANTEE SAFE DELIVERY AND SATISFACTION—IF YOU CANNOT FIND IT AT NEAREST STORE.

IF YOU ARE INTERESTED IN ANY KIND OF A FIREARM, WRITE FOR OUR BEAUTIFUL NEW GUIDE AND CATALOG FOR 1907. FREE

Gives more points on guns than any catalog published. Illustrated prices and most complete line.

THE HOPKINS & ALLEN ARMS CO.,
Dept. 66, Norwich, Conn., U.S.A.
European Office—6 City Road, Finsbury Square, London.
Largest Manufacturers of High-Grade, Popular-Priced Firearms in the World.

CHAPTER V.

Keeneyes was left at the hotel where he at once went to his room, took from his valise a quantity of blank paper and notes and immediately wrote upon his autobiography.

Jansen Moore, feeling somewhat like a schoolboy on a holiday, secured a fine horse-ville a-foot.

In the time he came in sight of Whiteoak Farm.

He approached it cautiously.

He had never seen the farm before, but the fact that it was the home of Sophia Le Brune made it for him with the tenderest interest. It is true he had met Sophia but once, while, however, that was the kind of young man that must look at a girl five or six months before coming to a conclusion, and he had already reached the conclusion that he was in love. He would have in the meantime, no active care about it, but he fancied he was not mistaken. In the meantime he would examine her homestead.

He trudged along the country road, gazing at the cultivated fields.

At last he saw a big red gate with a patent lock on it without a fence standing out of one's buggy. From the gate, a road swept over the fields to a house set upon a hill and surrounded by oak trees. It was pretty and picturesque. Every one knows what a house with a hitchway, looking over the wire fence at the house, and the barn, and the fields. His heart beat. It was also where her greatuncle had been murdered, but he thought little of that. The great-uncle was dead and gone, Sophia was a living question.

Moore stopped at the gate and beyond the gate, when a form appeared upon the piazza of the farmhouse. It was that of a woman, no doubt Sophia's mother. Jansen Moore stopped abruptly and gazed. She was a tall, low and slight with golden hair; yes, if it wasn't Sophia—that, however, was impossible—it was Miss Smart. Sophia, it must be Sophia's mother.

The woman had looked at him. Moore was powerless to go on, but he felt that he needed some excuse for standing at the gate in the middle of the road. He took his letters from his pocket and pretended to examine them as if he had lost something. Between times, he looked covertly toward the farmhouse. The form upon the piazza did not move.

Presently, Moore resolutely thrust his letters into his pocket and moved on to the gate. He opened it and entered the pasture, and slowly walked up the lane, trying to determine on what he would say when he reached the house. He came to a yard full of discarded implements. The form on the piazza did not change. The blonde head was bent toward him and the blue eyes were riveted on his face.

Jansen Moore walked up to the piazza, doffing his hat as he paused before the steps.

"Good morning," said the lady of forty-five. She was dressed in black, but despite the shadow wrought by grief and mourning, the likeness to her young daughter was evident.

"Good morning," said Moore.

"I was afraid you were going on by our farm," said the lady, smiling.

"Oh, no," Jansen Moore assured her. "I wanted to see you."

"Do you know what time it is?" Mrs. Le Brune inquired rather coldly.

Jansen Moore seemed to draw forth his watch. "Almost ten o'clock, Mrs. Le Brune," he responded.

"I looked for you three hours ago," said the lady.

"Oh!" murmured Moore, aghast.

"You are late!" she said severely.

"I—I—I—" Jansen Moore stammered the young man.

"I—I—I—" he said, "I did not lose any more time," said the lady with the air of pardoning a child. "I am not using your coat on that honey-suckle frame."

"Hang my coat!" repeated the young man.

"Yes,—on that frame, yonder."

"I have no purpose to keep on my coat," said Moore tenaciously.

"You will ruin it if you do," said Mrs. Le Brune. "Come, I will show you the way."

It was evident to Jansen Moore that he had been mistaken for somebody else. That, however, suited him exactly, since it was the wish of Keeneyes that he conceal his real identity.

Mrs. Le Brune walked around the house, and Moore followed her in suspense. At the rear of the house they came in sight of a barn lot, at the back of which stood a barn much larger than the house. In the lot were four oxen and a horse. The horse had his four legs tied together in an indiscriminate bunch as he lay upon his heaving side. The four men were keeping the animal from bouncing up into the air. One sat upon his neck. Another held his tail.

Mrs. Le Brune called to the men: "You can get one or two of his legs loose, now, here is the gentleman that has agreed to subdue him."

Jansen Moore felt a cold sweat break out upon his forehead. "Come on," said the man perched upon the beast's neck. "You've got to take my place as soon as Jerry can get him legs loosed. It's your life insho'."

"No, it isn't," said Jansen Moore, stopping short.

"What do you want done here?" called the man at the tail.

"Is the horse vicious?" asked Moore, cautiously approaching the lot-fence.

"You read our advertisement, didn't you?" said Mrs. Le Brune in surprise. "He crippled my best hand last week from mere wanton cruelty, simply slipped up behind him and tried to trample him down."

"He is a small animal to be so strong," remarked Moore, trying to decide upon some course of action.

"Yes, he is strong enough," returned the mistress of Whiteoak Farm. "Yesterday we found him in the house."

"How did he be?"

"Five years old."

"And your uncle, Mr. Boliver Beying was killed in the house four years ago?"

Mrs. Le Brune's face changed. "What has the horse to do with my poor uncle?"

"I don't know," said Moore with judicial air, "perhaps much, perhaps nothing. Mrs. Le Brune, you have mistaken my personality. I am not a subtuer of vicious horses.—far from it, entirely removed from such a thing. I am a——your daughter came to us yesterday——"

"What!" exclaimed the lady in amazement. "You are the detective?"

"Well," said Jansen Moore, "when Miss Le Brune came yesterday and told us how sad tragedy in the life of her family——"

"Are you the detective?" demanded the other sharply.

"I am," said the young man desperately.

"Then why did you not tell me so?"

"You seemed to know why I was here, and that I was coming," said Moore. "You took charge of me the minute I entered the yard. How did I know you mistook me for a horse-trainer?"

"True. I beg your pardon. Then let us return to the house. I suppose the others will come by-and-by. It was all my fault."

Moore's conscience prompted him to say, "I should have introduced myself at once, but when you invited me to take off my coat——"

"Yes, yes, you are entirely excusable, or rather, I am altogether to blame. Mr. Zellers," she said kindly.

"I am here," said Moore.

"Pray do not advert to it again. Mr. Zellers," said the lady with a gentle smile as like Sophia's that Moore almost fell in love with the mother. "We will have to get acquainted all over. Mr. Zellers, and on the right footing."

She stammered Jansen Moore, "I said I was a detective."

"The whole world knows it," said Mrs. Le Brune as they stepped upon the piazza. "Come in, Mr. Zellers."

"But I am not Mr. Zellers," said Moore, bravely. He said to himself, "After this she won't believe I have anything."

"Ah, excuse me," said Mrs. Le Brune smiling. "Of course, as you are now considered upon professional duties, you prefer to be known as Mr. Keeneyes. That is just and delicate, also. At home you are Mr. Zellers, but to the world you are Mr. Keeneyes. Have a seat, Mr. Keeneyes."

They were in the cool parlor, through the windows of which a rose-scented breeze was delicately wafted.

Jansen Moore sat down and mopped his brow with an agitated hand.

CHAPTER VI.

Jansen Moore was greatly embarrassed to be mistaken. His difficulty was great. Mrs. Le Brune had first mistaken him for a horse-trainer, then for Keeneyes. Now, when he understood her, what would he think?—that he was an imposter, a tramp, an adventurer? He the consequences what they might, he must disclose himself to be Jansen, and with a miserable sinking of the heart he cleared his throat to make the plunge, when the lady of Whiteoak Farm said:

"I am surprised that my daughter did not return as soon as you, Mr. Keeneyes. But her letter, which came this morning, evidently on the same train that brought you, informs me that she intends to stay again today at Banks to finish her interview."

"Yes," said Moore, "but it was best for the detective to hurry here immediately and he—I—you have made a—a mistake about me; I am——"

"I hope you did not bring young Mr. Moore with you," said the lady confidentially. "My daughter tells me that when she went to lay the case before you there was a young man present named Moore."

"Yes," said the latter, "Jansen Moore."

"My daughter was much displeased with his manners," said Mrs. Le Brune.

"He has the manners of a savage," said Moore bitterly.

"She did not seem to find them so," returned the lady; "on the contrary, he was too eager in his address. He was too assured. I do not know how to explain it better than reading you a part of her letter."

"I beg you to do so," said Jansen Moore, gloomily.

Mrs. Le Brune got the letter, and having mumbled over the first page to herself, said, "Now, here is the place:

"There was a young man present whom Mr. Zellers said was his assistant. His name is Moore. I found him as disagreeable as Mr. Zellers is charming. Not that he meant to be rude; on the contrary, he wished to be too friendly. He forced himself upon me when I went back to the boarding house, so that I could not escape his escort. He even went upon the porch with me and there he shook hands in a silly fashion. He thinks he is handsome and is inordinately vain of his mustache. I do hope, mamma, that Mr. Zellers won't bring him to Whiteoak Farm. If he does, you must find some way to discourage his assurance."

Jansen Moore gasped, caught his breath and then said grimly, "Your daughter has certainly read Mr. Keeneyes's character to the very punctuation marks."

The lady laughed, then apologized, "did not expect me to read you the compliment she was passing upon yourself, Mr. Zellers."

"I appreciate it all the more," said the young man still grimly. "I read her heart without her intending me to do so. Thank you very much."

"Mr. Zellers," said the lady persuasively, "did you bring that Mr. Moore with you?"

"Well—yes, sir—yes, I did," Moore hesitated. Then he added, "It was really necessary to have him. Otherwise I should have left him at home. He is a most insufferable cub, vain, uncouth and self-assured; but the beast is rather intelligent, and this case calls for an assistant."

"I trust you can keep him in the background while my daughter is at home," said Mrs. Le Brune a little anxiously.

"I will do so, I will do so. And now, Mrs. Le Brune, not to inquire at present into the death of your uncle, which I have already pretty thoroughly sifted, I desire to ass

"What, you are the detective?"

if you have owned that vicious horse since his birth?"

"We have, Mr. Zellers."

"Has he always been vicious?"

"He has always been very spirited and wild, but we did not know he was vicious till this year."

"Ah," said Moore, trying to look like Keeneyes. "And did he ever get into this house before Friday?"

"He has broken into the hall several times."

"Might he not have entered the house on the very day your uncle was killed?"

"The animal was here on the farm, but no one spoke of its having done so."

"Ah," said Moore profoundly. "Good. Excellent. I think I had better return now to my assistant, and confer with him over a view I have formed."

"Mr. Zellers," said the lady eagerly, "is it possible that after the lapse of so long a time, you have been able to discover something new since coming to Fenceville?"

"Madam, I have," said Moore, rising. "I have learned something very vital, very vital indeed."

"Then the blow fall where it may!" cried Mrs. Le Brune with energy. "If those who married sew my uncle and are living now in happy married life as the fruit of that crime, let the blow fall where it will."

"The blow will fall," said Moore with deep solemnity, "and it will fall, madam, where it will!" With this profound saying, Jansen Moore withdrew. He hastened to Fenceville and found Keeneyes in their room at the hotel.

"I thought," said Keeneyes peevishly, "that you were not coming back till dusk."

"Get your mind out of your biography," said Moore abruptly, "for you'll need it in making future history. Listen here, Mr. Zellers, I want out to Whiteoak Farm——"

"And they found you out, eh?"

"They mistook me for you."

"What!" cried Keeneyes in displeasure. "But you set them right!"

"No, I didn't. Mrs. Le Brune still thinks I am Keeneyes, and I left her telling the farmhands so."

"She thinks you are me?"

"Yes, and she made me promise to keep you in the background during her daughter's return."

"Keep me in the background!" exclaimed Keeneyes.

"Yes."

"But I won't be kept in any sort of a background!" cried Keeneyes.

"I was afraid you wouldn't," mourned Jansen Moore. "Well, it's all up with me then. But go ahead. Expose me. It would come sooner or later, of course."

"Jansen Moore," said Keeneyes, thrusting his autobiography into his valise in a forcible manner, "what does this talk of keeping me in the background mean? I say, what does it mean?"

"Just this, Mr. Zellers. It seems that Mrs. Le Brune was expecting a horse-trainer this morning and when she saw me——"

"But you said you wouldn't let anybody see you," snapped Keeneyes.

"I wish nobody had!" Moore groaned.

"I wish I had kept you shut up in this room," retorted Keeneyes. "Well, she was looking for a horse-trainer and when she saw you, she thought you were the trainer. And you didn't undeceive her. But when the time came to begin the training, you thought that a good time to tell the truth, eh! So you told her you were the detective, and she jumped to the conclusion that you were me, and you let her jump, eh!"

"That is all so, but you haven't the best, Mr. Zellers. She had a letter there from her daughter and she read it to me, and it abused me for everything she could think of, abused me for forcing myself upon her company upon her, and for shaking hands with her at parting—and to tell the truth she was like drawing a tooth to let go of her hand, and after I'd heard all that roast, I hadn't the nerve to speak up and say, 'I cannot run after a lie, I am Jansen Moore.' So she thinks I am Keeneyes, and she thinks I am going to keep in the background."

"But the moment Miss Sophia appears on the scene," said Keeneyes, "she will undeceive her mother."

"Oh, I suppose so," Moore acquiesced miserably. "I wish I were dead!"

"You would certainly be less troublesome if you were," said Keeneyes. "Now, keep still and let me think this over." The celebrated detective closed his gray eyes, stretched his long legs out and locked his toes. Presently he said sleepily, "You didn't find any clews out there, I suppose?"

"I judge so," said Moore. "That vicious horse they've had five years—sometimes it gets into the house. Why couldn't he have been in there four years ago? Why couldn't he have given the old uncle a kick to lay him out? And why couldn't it have dragged the body from the kitchen to the parlor? In this case, no human being is responsible for the death."

"Moore, did you think of that all by yourself?"

"I did."

"Then we will let Mrs. Le Brune think you are Keeneyes, and I will keep in the background as long as Miss Sophia will let us. Keep mum. Now, will you promise to stay in this room until I come back?"

"I will," said Moore humbly.

Keeneyes was gone about an hour and a half and Moore felt the need of dinner acutely before his room door opened to the light touch.

"No dinner yet," said Keeneyes, seating himself. "I have two more facts to add to you. The first is a note I have just sent to J. J. James."

Jansen Moore groaned.

"I will read you a copy of it:

"'My Dear Mr. James:

"'The last time I wrote you I asked you to come to Mrs. Le Brune's barn between the hours of 11 and 12 tonight for an interview.

"'I beg to advise you that since writing that, I have unearthed a valuable clew. I am now convinced that Mr. Bolliver Bering was killed by a kick from the vicious horse on the farm; was dragged by said horse from the kitchen to parlor, and, therefore, no human agency was at work during the tragedy.

"'In view of this remarkable discovery, it will not be necessary for you to come to Whiteoak Farm at the late hour specified. And, being pleased to be able to think better of you than I at first found possible, I beg to remain yours truly.

"'JANSEN MOORE.'"

There was a deathlike silence in the room for several minutes. Then Jansen Moore, painfully controlling his voice, said, "How do you insist upon putting me in the light of an antagonist to this J. J. James?"

"I don't," said Mr. Keeneyes serenely; it is for you to infer why."

"And again," said Moore, "how can you write a note and sign my name to it without my knowledge or consent?"

"My dear fellow," said Keeneyes, "this is not your name; you are Richard Zellers, better known as Keeneyes, and I am Jansen Moore. I am the fellow to be kept in the background. You are the star actor."

"But—" cried Moore loudly.

"But," Keeneyes interposed hastily, "the note is sent; it's a fact now; there's no use to try to argue it away; it's done. Now I have a second fact to add to you. Here is a copy of a telegram I have sent Miss Sophia Le Brune at Banks, Mo.:

"'Miss Sophia Le Brune:

"'On your return home, you will find Jansen Moore pretending to be Keeneyes, and Keeneyes will be masquerading as Jansen Moore. This is absolutely essential to the success of the case. Do not reveal the truth even to mother. ZELLERS.'"

"But," said Moore, after all, Mrs. Le Brune will go on thinking me Keeneyes. And I will keep in the background, if possible. But please don't hand me any more facts. That note you forged to Sophia's guardian——"

"But it is not forgery, my friend, for you are now Keeneyes and I am Jansen Moore."

"But J. J. James knows better, and you represent me as being convinced that Bolliver Bering was killed by a kick from the vicious horse, when it was merely an idea that occurred to me."

"Well, well, the note is a fact. Let us go to dinner."

This extremely interesting and humorous story of detective work will be continued in next week's Ledger. You will miss a great deal of amusement, as well as much mystery and exciting incidents, if you fail to read this capital story to the close. Thousands are subscribing for the Ledger each month, so that they may not miss any of the great stories appearing constantly in its pages. You would like to have your name on our list. Look at our premium offers on page thirteen and fifteen and see if you do not want one of our King Cameras or six of our spring patterns. They are forwarded to you absolutely without charge.

A Cold Day.

We have a few subscribers who put us in mind of Tom Jones when the Swede collector said had promised to pay his account in January. As the story was told, the Swede returned from an unsuccessful trip and told the boss that "Tim John say he will pay when him sell his hogs. Tim Smit he will pay when he sell him wheat. Tom Ferry say he will pay in March or January."

"Well," said the boss, "that is the first time Tom ever set a time to pay. Did he really say he would pay in January?"

"Well aye tank he say so, mebbe. "He say it been a cold day when you got dat money. I tank dat been in January."

Ladies, Preserve Your Youthful Appearance.

Madame Mignette's Beauty Cream and Skin Food removes all facial defects, as spot, freckle, pimple, blemish or wrinkle, leaving the skin soft, clear and velvety. It is perfectly harmless and will not injure the most delicate skin. It preserves and brings back the youthful look to the face and roundness to the cheeks, preserving it in that youthful and attractive state. This preparation has been used for years and hundreds are now using it and are more than delighted with the results.

Send us ten (10) cents for formula which you can put up at any drug store. It is a very small cost. Do not delay, but write at once. Box 431, Blairsville, Pa.

Earlie—Papa, what is a hypochondriac?

Professor Blighton—A hypochondriac, my boy, is a person who has no disease, but many complaints.

A Dainty Little Maid.

Every one ought to have her. She is dressed in pretty colors and changes the color of her skirt herself when it is going to rain. She indicates when it is wise to take an umbrella or when you can do without. She is the simplest of best of fancy stores. She is an ornament. A good seller for agents, a pretty gift, good business souvenir and very popular. She or one of her sisters will be postpaid with full directions for only 10 cents. W. F. Randolph & Co., 78 Dearborn St., Chicago.

An Amateur Actor's Adventure.

BY REGINALD B. ADAMS.

Love of theatricals was a passion with Percy Mackenzie, and at Stockton, Cal., his birthplace, he had taken part in many amateur dramatic performances, and acquitted himself with great credit. He had taken a full collegiate course, had graduated with honor, and intended to adopt the legal profession.

But one year of dull routine in the office of a local lawyer had disgusted him with the intricacies of the law, he withdrew from the office and went to San Francisco, with the intention of seeking employment as an actor, at any theater where he could secure an engagement, even in a humble capacity.

He was young, stalwart, fair-looking, had the address of a gentleman, and felt that he only needed an opportunity to demonstrate his ability.

It was a chilly night in December when he arrived in San Francisco. But the weather did not disturb Percy Mackenzie, his chief thought being to hit upon some way of making his talents ability useful.

Before presenting his letters of introduction to the prominent managers, and allowing them to fight it out between themselves and decide which should have him, he determined to devote a day or two to the inspection of the Golden Gate City, the incidents of which recorded history occurred about four months previous to the great earthquake of April last. So, after a hasty meal at the Metropolitan, he sauntered out to mingle with the throngs in the gay thoroughfares. Wearying of the bustle at Market and Kearney streets, he turned into Polk street. Here several houses, as he strolled along, he heard the sounds of music and the merry laughter of children.

Honestly, lonely, he felt his heart glow under the inspiration of this mirth, and an uncontrollable curiosity seized him. The window-curtains were drawn aside, and from the opposite side of the street a fine view of the young merrymakers might be had.

Percy crossed, and ascending the steps of a house almost directly opposite—a large, but gloomy, unlighted mansion, and shivering himself from the chilly wind under the projecting porch, he enjoyed the moving spectacle with a zest that was brightened by his lonely position and dismal surroundings. He had been there unnoticed in the doorway less than a minute, however, when the door suddenly opened behind him.

A hand seized his arm, he was drawn in, and the door closed.

"Hush! Follow me!" came a whisper, in a woman's voice.

All was dark save the faint light that made its way from a heavily shaded lamp in a back room, the door of which was open. Percy would have asked for an explanation; but the female figure was already gliding up the stairs, and being young and self-reliant, he reflected that he would prefer to follow on the adventure, even if he should have his choice, which he had not by any means, so far as the affair had gone.

The explanation might be made as well upstairs as below, he reasoned, so he proceeded the mysterious figure. It fitted before him noiselessly, and then disappeared through a doorway at the second floor, through which a faint light came out to struggle ineffectually with the darkness.

Without further hesitation, he followed into an elegantly furnished boudoir. The guide paused at a table, and turned up the shaded lamp, which had been burning dimly upon it. Then, with the table between them, stood a lovely woman, queenly in statuesque grace of bearing and clothed with a taste that was in keeping with the refined air and haughty manner of the wearer.

No sooner did the increased light enable her to distinguish his features than the woman gave a stifled cry, and a look of horror distorted her beautiful face.

"What is this? You are not Walter Vane!" she cried.

"No, madame; I'm Percy Mackenzie, an amateur actor in search of an engagement. What I do for now" replied the new voluntary guest, with a desperate assurance.

"What are you doing here? Go; leave me! You should not have come!" moaned the lady, wringing her hands.

"If you will be cool and think a little, madame," he replied, "you will recollect the fact that I am not to blame for being here—that I was, in fact, dragged in."

"I mistook you for another person. Now go away." said the unwilling hostess, in great terror.

"Fear nothing. I understand the mistake," the young man replied, "although it must say it was a strange one."

"Go! go!" she cried.

He bowed, and moved toward the door. A sound made him pause. The woman heard, too. It was the latching and unlatching of the hall door. A step was ascending the stairs.

She sprang forward, and laid her hand on his arm.

"Some one is coming!" she whispered, in great agitation. "You cannot go now. Stay! If you would save a woman's honor——"

"Anything to be obliging; but really, this adventure is getting to be quite dramatic," said the young man, with a coolness that was exasperating to the lady, who trembled like a leaf.

Escape to the hall was impossible. The footsteps were drawing near, and in another moment the newcomer, cautiously as he was approaching, would be in the room.

Acting on the impulse of the moment, the visitor darted into an adjoining room, the only hiding-place at hand, and had barely closed the door behind him when the second visitor arrived.

The door did, however, been left slightly ajar by Mackenzie in the haste of his retreat, and the latter had a partial view of what went on in the room after his retirement. He kept his ears open to events, for his position was far from reassuring.

The newcomer entered the apartment with some caution. He was not, then, the husband of the lady, as Mackenzie had supposed.

What was going to happen new?

He began to wish himself out of the scrape. He was not fine on opportunity to steal out, glide down the stairs, and so into the street? No he taken for a thief, if caught in this plight? No, that would never do. He would stay where he was, and take to luck.

The last visitor was a tall, handsome man, of soldierly bearing, blond, blue-eyed elegant in dress and manners, and not far beyond thirty. His mysterious glance about him.

"We are alone?" he inquired.

The woman, who received him standing at the opposite side of the table, answered, with a cold nod. Her air was more haughty and frigid than before.

"I was surprised that you risked leaving the door ajar for me. I took it for a good omen, Clara. Was I right?" remarked the guest.

The lady thus familiarly addressed started as if stung by the inference of his presumptuous tone, and replied deliberately, but petulance disappearing as her earnestness asserted itself:

"Mr. Vane, this is the first interview we have had in three years."

"Yes, since the eve of our wedding in San Jose, when you jilted a boudoir for me. When I appeared at the rendezvous, you refused to keep your promise, and said you were simply amusing yourself with me. Then your marriage was hastened, and you became the wife of another, another tryeling-place for you to keep your promise. So you made my humiliation complete. Oh, I shall never forget it," interrupted the handsome visitor, striking the table with his hand and throwing himself nonchalantly into a chair.

The woman remained standing, pale with resolution, and resumed:

"It was a silly girl's foolishly toyed with your affections, and Heaven knows I have no cause to rejoice in the fate which my marriage I have never known peace. You have pursued me everywhere with letters—in Europe, in the East, and at home. My servants have been bribed to hand me your missives by my husband's house and strangers have thrust them into my hands in the theater, at the opera, or in the restaurant, forcing me to hear correspondence that is my constant terror."

She paused, and walked across the room. It was Mackenzie making a desperate effort to restrain his desire "to hit that fellow over once," as he afterward put it, a whisper.

The visitor received this accusation coolly, and replied:

"True; but if you suffer, imagine my misery. I do not believe you love the one woman you love? You may have pretended affection—I did not; I love you in earnest, with all my heart and soul."

The woman shuddered at the intensity of his tone. There was something alarming in it.

"Is he going to kill her?" thought Mackenzie, watching every movement keenly.

There was, indeed, a blaze of insanity in the eyes of the guest that would have alarmed the strongest heart. The lady quailed a moment before him, but by a strong effort of the will recovered her self-possession, and continued:

"You have demanded a private interview, that I may be still further compromised."

"Yes, I have asked time for years, confident that if I might speak with you, and plead my sufferings, your sex would surely judge me favorably," replied the visitor, with a fierce earnestness.

"Is another man's wife?"

There was a perceptible softening in the tones of the woman's voice, despite the effort she made at indignation.

"His wife? No—he stole you! You are mine by right. A foolish impulse, a girlish prank, and you took your former name!"

The ferocity with which the man said this startled even Mackenzie, who was following the dramatic scene with eager attention from his place of concealment. The visitor had, for the moment, the air of a madman.

The woman shuddered and grew pale with terror, but with a mighty effort seemed to gain the mastery, and regain her self-possession. She went on, in her former cold and haughty tone:

"Finally, to effect your purpose, you had recourse to threats. You reminded me that during my girlish flirtation I had written you letters——"

"Yes, avowing your love, and agreeing to our elopement," interrupted the man bitterly.

The young wife trembled visibly at this reminder of her folly, but soon recovered, continued:

"You threatened to send those letters to my husband unless I consented to have retented, for I, though doubting you, have ever kept my word—even on the offer on your part to return my letters and cease your torture," said the lady, twisting her fingers nervously, as if eager to clutch the fatal missives.

"And I have kept my promise," returned her handsome guest. "Here they are."

He drew a packet from the pocket of his coat and placed it on the table. The woman bounded forward, and laid her hand on it. He also had remained there with a firm hold, however, and thus they remained.

"Remember, Clara Vane," he remarked, when you take these, they are my gift, in no manner can they assert itself in your heart—that you may be led to a similar generosity in restoring me my happiness, as I restore yours."

Her eyes met his with a soft, languishing expression. He released the packet, and she drew it to her eagerly. Tearing off the envelope, she glanced over the dozen or so dainty little letters with a hungry glare, casting each into the flame of the open grate, where they were sending up its bright and cheering flames. The last she held in her hand until all the rest of it was consumed, and fell in ashes at her feet.

Then she turned once more to her eyes and her form straightened up proudly. Pricing on her guest a look of mingled scorn and hate, she exclaimed:

"Fool! My long slavery is at an end! You are dismissed forever!"

"I am not disarmed!" he cried, suddenly changing his manner from tender humility to fierce defiance. "I still hold faith in you; I suspected your false heart. Here, I have brought you the corresponding all of your letters—that proposing the elopement three years ago. I bear no date, and no one can prove that it was not written yesterday. Here it is, sealed in this envelope, and addressed to your husband."

The woman turned pale.

"I hold this," he resumed moodily, as he replaced the letter in his pocket, "in the hope of forcing your heart to awaken to its old love; but you have shown me how false it is. I am not to be trifled with, and will not worth the leading away, as I might lead it by the chain I hold here. But my ambition is not dead, and my passion must be avenged, and your cruel heart must have a bitter punishment. This is my revenge."

He took from his pocket a carefully folded paper, and, shaking it gratefully, poured into a glass half filled with water, which stood on the table, a powder he had held concealed.

"What do you mean?" exclaimed the lady, regarding her visitor with a look of intense horror.

"I mean that I have taken poison," he replied wildly, "and in a few minutes I shall be a corpse. When your husband and your friends return, account for my presence as you may. Reflect that you have wrecked my life, that you have been the cause of my death!"

As he said the last words his speech became thick, his eyes rolled wildly in their sockets, he staggered, balanced a moment erect, with a horrible smile on his twitching and distorted features, and then, pitching forward, fell to the floor on his face, with a dreadful thud, and lay there motionless.

HER COMMENCEMENT ESSAY.

"Beyond the Alps Lies Italy"—she paused and bit her pen,
Then wrote another word or two, then paused and bit again—
"Beyond the Alps," she shook her head and softly rubbed her brow
And said: "I wish that I could map it out somehow.
I've looked at organdie and mulle and taffeta and lawn—
I liked one piece of crepe de chine, but now that piece is gone."

"Beyond the Alps, Lies Italy"—she made a flourish there
And laid her pen beside the sheet with a distracted air.
"Beyond the"——"Shall I have it ruched or shall I have it plain?
They say that flounces wide and deep are coming in again;
Sometimes I think it would be nice to put on lots of braid,
And then again my fancy runs to something appliqued.

"Beyond the Alps Lies Italy"—she turned and took a heap
Of samples from the table top and studied long and deep.
"I like this rosebud pattern and this one with dots of blue,
And this with stripes invisible, I think I like it, too.
But shall I have it made up plain? It might be well, I guess,
To have it so that afterwards 'twill be a party dress."

"Beyond the Alps Lies Italy"—she pushed the page away
And murmured: "This won't do at all; I must decide today.
The mountain peaks of taffeta and organdie are high—
Beyond them, through the snows of mulle, my unsolved problems lie.
I cannot write my essay now—that trouble is my least;
The principal affairs come first—I'll write to my modiste."

The lady gave a shriek, and rushed forward to save him. She only caught his arm, however, and the weight of his body brought her to her knees beside him. She put her arms about him and turned his face up to the light.

"Dead dead!" she frantically cried, dropping the head of the corpse in her terror.

Then, on a sudden impulse, she began an eager search of the body, ending in the production of the sealed letter the dead man had so boastfully displayed. Tottering forward toward the grate, she put it into the fire, and, with a hysterical laugh, watched it burn.

As she turned she found herself face to face with Percy Mackenzie. He was pale, and evidently horror-stricken.

She trembled violently at the sight of him. In the excitement of the terrible scene she had quite forgotten the presence of an unbidden witness.

She shrank from him as from an accuser. Pointing to the corpse, she cried:

"They will say I murdered him!" and fell to the floor in a deep swoon.

Mackenzie stood for a moment, bewildered, between the living and the dead; then, suddenly arousing himself, exclaimed:

"He was a crazy scoundrel, and he did the right thing to kill himself. But he died here! What an awful revenge if it be carried out to the end. But it shall not be if I can prevent it!"

The rash young Mackenzie made his way down the stairs, opened the street door, stepped out, and looked up and down the street. The darkness was intense, and not a soul was in view.

Returning to the apartment where he had passed such terrible moments, he hurriedly, he without much ado, seized the contorted corpse of the dead man, and, shouldering it, staggered down the staircase with his gruesome burden.

Out into the darkness he made his way, and chose a desirable spot.

The next morning the body of Walter Vane was found some distance away, lying near the mouth of a sand-cavern, who frequent one of the side streets. It seemed plain to the coroner's jury that the young man had been dragged into the cavern.

Mackenzie had no inclination to reveal the truth, as he did not appear to accept an erroneous conjecture. He had saved the honor of a woman, and escaped the charge of a villian or a maniac. The woman he never met or heard of again. But a month later, after he had secured an engagement as "walking gentleman" in one of the San Francisco theaters, when he left for home by curiosity, he found the house vacant. On inquiring of a servant lounging at the gateway of an adjacent residence, he learned that the occupants, an invalid lady and her husband, had gone to New York, and that the dwelling was for sale.

WENT TO TEA

And It Wound Her Bobbin,

Tea drinking frequently affects people as badly as coffee. A lady in Salisbury, Mo., found that she was completely undermining the use of coffee a good many years ago, because it nearly ruined her health and that she went over to tea drinking, but finally, when the habit began to get hold she had lost twenty-five pounds and no food seemed to agree with her.

"Then," she says, "At this time I was induced to take up the famous food drink, Postum, and it was not long before the good results that I have never been without it since. I commenced to improve at once, regained my twenty-five pounds of flesh and went some beyond my usual weight.

"I am glad to be able to be sure and healthful, and there never was an article, and never will be, that will do this for me as surely take the place of coffee, as Postum Food Coffee. The beauty of it all is that it is pure food and nourishing. I feel as if I could not sing its praises too loud." Read the book, "Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Once Is Sufficient.

"Perhaps you never noticed it," remarked the thoughtful thinker, "but it is true, nevertheless——"

"What is true?" queried the party at the other end of the park bench.

"That a woman never uses her husband's meerschaum pipe for a hammer more than once," explained the X Ray.

Map of the World 25 Cents.

A beautiful map, valuable for reference, printed on heavy paper, with linen, mounted on rollers, edges bound in cloth, showing our new island possessions, the Trans-Siberian Railway, Pacific Ocean cables, railway lines and other features of Japan, China, Manchuria, Korea and the Far East. Sent postpaid for 25 cents in stamps by W. B. Kniskern, P. T. M. Chicago & North-Western Railway, Chicago, Ill.

She's Dreaming.

"There goes Miss Letters. I understand she is quite literary."

"Who told you so?"

"She did——"

"Ah, well, don't wake her up."

CURE FOR LIQUOR AND TOBACCO.

The Kansas Anti-Liquor Society is mailing free a recipe for the cure of the liquor habit. It can be given secretly in food. A society for the promotion of temperance. Address Kansas Anti-Liquor Society, 15 Gray Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

A Natural Conclusion.

Eagle—What makes so many cattails grow in this pond, Mollie?

Mollie—Oh, they grow up from little kittles that people have drowned here, of course.

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

35 YEARS OLD.

Published Every Saturday

—BY—

W. D. BOYCE CO.

All communications should be addressed to

THE CHICAGO LEDGER,
112, 114 DEARBORN ST.,
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscriptions to the Chicago Ledger by mail $1.00 a year, 50 cents for six months, in advance. If not paid in advance, $1.05 a year, $1.50 for six months. Local Chicago subscribers, $1.00 a year. Remittances should be by check, draft, or Express Money Order, payable to The Chicago Ledger. Subscription price in Canada, $1.05 a year.

ADVERTISING.

Advertising rate $1.05 per Agate Line per insertion, for advertisements in The Chicago Ledger and Sunday Blade.

Entered at the postoffice at Chicago, Illinois, as second-class matter.

THE CHICAGO LEDGER
AND
THE SATURDAY BLADE
Average More Than 750,000
COPIES WEEKLY
PROVED CIRCULATION.

BACK NUMBERS.

Back numbers of the Ledger can be had by addressing this office. Always give the numbers desired, plainly written, accompanied by your full address, and your order will receive prompt attention. Price per copy.

BEWARE OF STRANGERS.

The Ledger pays no traveling agents to solicit subscriptions, and every person working in that capacity is a fraud. No person is authorized to take subscriptions for the Ledger unless he or she is well known in the city or village where they live and their name appears to well in the paper every week. A liberal reward will be paid for evidence that will enable us to convict any such person operating in this manner. Write to town or different sections of the city where you live and warn your friends and neighbors against defrauding the people. Beware of strangers.

Invention is the mother of trusts and promotion is the stepfather.

Our idea of a smart baby is one that does its sleeping during the night.

Anyway, the pace that kills always gets its victim on the front page.

It takes a skillful artist to make a spanking likeness of a dumb person.

The tongue of a flatterer either has a fool back of it or one in front of it.

If a girl can only get engaged she is seldom in a hurry to get married.

It is legitimate, though useless, to begin agitating at once for a sane Fourth.

If it wasn't for the mistakes they make some men would never be heard of.

Love is apt to make a fool of a man, but most men are willing to take chances.

Some men manage to acquire a reputation for cleverness by working what little they know overtime.

Enterprising actresses are giving up pug dogs and are now satisfied with nothing less than boy husbands as pets.

However, Corey knows that Pittsburg can be depended on very soon to do something that will cause his little adventure to be forgotten.

It took a Philadelphia preacher one and two-thirds minutes to marry a man and woman who were in a hurry. No town is likely to be slow all the time.

If a man doesn't fall in love until after he spends one thousand of $0 he probably lolls works overtime in an effort to make up for the neglected opportunities.

Bryan thinks the people will never be likely to do to the railroads what the railroads have done to the people. May even such a promise may not be wholly reassuring to the railroads.

Mrs. Howard Gould insists that her husband has an income of $1,000,000 a year. It is probably safe to assume that Howard is one of the people who think it would be an outrage to have an income tax in this country.

J. Pierpont Morgan is going to tear down a modest house in front of Ark so that he may have a garden. We would earnestly advise the boys who are not familiar with his ways to refrain from stealing any of J. Pierpont's watermelons.

It is reported from Berlin that a professor has found out how to make large artificial diamonds which cannot be distinguished from the real gems. Why does any professor want to spend his time in finding out how to put diamonds within reach of the masses? The masses won't want them when they become common, anyhow.

TWO FACES UNDER ONE HAT.

By H. E. SCOTT.

Author of "The Pretty Typewriters," "The Girl from Nacoupin," etc.

[Copyright by the Author.]

Begun in No. 21, May 25. Subscriptions can begin with that issue or back copies can be had from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER XVI.
JOHN MERRILL.

At midday on the 28th of September, a young man dressed in the garb of a laborer entered the door of the postoffice in Denver and approached a window over which was a sign proclaiming it the general delivery.

"John Merrill" was the name he pronounced, as the face of a clerk appeared.

"John Merrill?" she repeated after him, and for a moment she disappeared. "No letters!" she announced a moment later.

The young man was about to turn away when she remarked: "Wait a moment, perhaps there may be papers."

"Possibly," replied Merrill.

"Yes," she presently said, "here is one, and I think that is all."

"Thanks," was the response, and Merrill received the package and hastily left the office; nor did he tear open the wrapper that covered the paper until he was seated on the bank of Cherry Creek several blocks distant, and then with hands trembling with agitation.

"The postmaster!" he exclaimed, as he consigned the wrapper to the current of the creek. "Now, then, what can it be?" Nothing that I have not already noted in Chicago papers. Caleb Marsh doubtless intended well. Had I remained in Coulton the prospect for me looked dark indeed; but now, now my fame is acclaimed no a murderer. Ah, the Coulton Record! And dated September 21st. Here is the column that interests me:

"NOT YET APPREHENDED.

"'Mark Perry, the dastardly murderer of Philip Bixby, still remains at large. As yet at-large, though the commissioners of Lundy County have offered a reward of five hundred dollars for his capture, and the murdered man's parents have also instituted innumerable private detectives on the assassin's trail. That both have failed and will be successful who afterwards made his escape, may soon be apprehended and brought to meet the fate which on the gallows must be the wish of all our citizens.

"That a being should exist who would thus ruthlessly murder his benefactor—who even at the time of the terrible deed had on his person ten thousand dollars in cash with which to take care of himself—that rested on the farm of the father of his betrothed, seems incredible.

"A fortunate thing for a confiding young lady of this county was it that Mr. Caleb Marsh and Attorney Graves caught the assassin almost in the very act.

"We are pleased to learn that Mr. Marsh who held the mortgages above alluded to and who had demanded of Mr. Bixby that the sum of a worthy citizen has granted an extension of the same."

John Merrill ceased reading with agitation when he finished reading the article.

"Fool! Fool, that I was!" he exclaimed. "Yes, to have listened to Caleb Marsh—to have accepted those files, and by flight to have afforded my enemy a clear field—will he sought for! The real murderer is safe —safe, and the world is deceived in the fense of Philip Bixby, a fugitive! Oh, Kate, my love, do you, too, hold me guilty? cannot believe that of you. Clarice! What should I do? Return and face my accusers? Yes, I will—I will! But my wife and child! I love—I cannot bear the brand of a murderer. Ah, but the evidence will condemn me! Marsh was right. Flight was folly. Perhaps in some way the dastard who committed the crime will be found out! Marsh has the money and the watch within whose case the name Philip Bixby is engraved. I will wait. Wait, and every day will seem a year.

"From the paper John Merrill again read the words: "That both he and his accomplice, Mark Perry, may soon be apprehended and brought to meet the fate they merit on the gallows must be the wish of all our citizens.

"Marsh stated that he was running a street ride for me, and that Perry, who should it be suspected that he furnished the rifle, had been in the employ of Manager. He has extended the mortgages—I had hoped that Mr. Horton would take them up. Can he believe me guilty? He has private detectives on the assassin's trail—or my trail, mine! Well, the article does not state, 'on the trail of Mark Perry.' May he not have them on the trail of the real assassin? Ah, but they will not! Coulton and become convinced that I am the assassin. Then the real will solve the mystery.

"I must follow out my plan, and bury myself in the mines. There is no use to wait longer for a letter from Caleb Marsh, for I feel that none will come. Marsh dare not take the risk. He sent the paper. He has acted as a friend—but is he? Is he? Why, but for him I should by this time be on trial for my life, and with everything against me. I should not doubt his friendship. And yet, he would have taken advantage of the necessities of Mr. Ellis, and coerced Kate into becoming his wife.

"Oh, God, if Caleb Marsh is false to me! Why, if he were, he had but to have aided in my conviction. The law would have removed me from his path. He must be my friend! But will he again seek to make Kate his wife? He has extended the mortgages. He has always been called a hard-hearted man; but he has not proved so to me.

"He told me I would one day return and make Kate my wife. He saw how utterly impossible it would have been for him to have won her love. I should not doubt him then. He has three hundred dollars in cash—the mortgages are extended, and they will not want. Arthur may return long before I do. I return? Ah, when? Some time, for some time the truth will come to light.

"Oh, Kate! God grant that you be true until that time arrives! And now, John Merrill, ere the rising of another sun, will I commence my journey from Denver even to Caleb Marsh."

Hurriedly the young man arose to his feet, and was on the point of starting away when the thought seized him: "He may write me, but I will not write! If he does, it were well that I received the letter."

Thoughtfully he stood for a moment considering his position.

"I will go there," he determined, "I may be apprehended. Detectives in Denver may be searching for Mark Perry. I can write to have any mail that I receive sent to me there. Yes, I will do so. This paper I am afraid to have in my possession!"

He tore it into fragments, cast the pieces into the creek, watched them disappear from view, and then hastily walk away.

CHAPTER XVII.
CALEB INVESTS MORE OF MARK'S MONEY.

John Merrill had argued rightly when sitting on the bank of Cherry Creek, reading that column from the Coulton Record, for Caleb Marsh had no idea of writing him a letter. That article will suffice," he had thought. "He will know from whence the paper comes and after reading it he dare not return. I am as effectually rid of him as though he had met the gallows, and he was afraid to trust to the chance of that.

"It is much better as I am not compelled, but somehow I would not just like to see the fellow hanged. Fool! There he is, and that is the end of it. Perhaps I did; but it was to serve my own ends—that I might make Ellis my wife, secure Elwood, and all the vast—well, never mind, it was well worth all I have ventured.

But a few days elapsed after Caleb had started Arthur Graves on the search for hundred dollars of Mark's money in his trembling hand before the cashier, and for the this time was he alone. A stout German girl accompanied him.

"Ah, Miss Ellis, good morning!" he said, when she opened the door to admit him. "I hope you are well. I have come on terrible shock, and that your father is comfortable this morning."

"Father is as usual, Mr. Marsh," was the reply. "Will you not come in?"

"Yes, yes, thanks," and by the way, Miss Kate, this is Lena Goff, the daughter of one of my tenants. Lena is doing work at home, and winter is close upon us. I have engaged her to remain here with me as a servant. Lena, you may help the housework, milk the cows, bring fuel on the kitchen fire, and keep Miss Kate company. Oh, don't look surprised! I have been for a long time that they have heavy a strain on you."

"But we cannot afford a girl, Mr. Marsh; the wages will be more than we can spare. Cows—you must know that we have none."

"Then you must have them, Miss Kate, mistake. You have as fine a cow as is to be found in Lundy County! Gives a foaming pail of milk night and morning. Look, there's a man just driving her in the gate—she's a beauty!"

"Why, Mr. Marsh, you——"

"Caleb, come right in!" called out Mr. Ellis. "I have been looking for you since the cow from the window! Bless your soul, I have watched Graves leaves from you, and after——"

"Good morning, neighbor, never mind! When one is in adversity, one finds who are his friends. Because Kate rejected me, should I turn from you in the hour of your trouble? No, no! That might be the way with some, but it is not the way with Caleb Marsh!"

"But the girl, Caleb——"

"Stays right here, sober, to lighten the burdens of your daughter. Can't you see the girl is working hard?"

"Yes, yes, Caleb, I know it! God bless you, I know it!" said the old man, as he brushed the tears from his eyes. "Take her to the kitchen, Kate, and show the man where to put the cow."

"But, father——"

"We can't thrust away such friendship, child! When Arthur comes home it shall all be repaid. Run on now and leave Caleb and me to talk the matter over."

"There is nothing special to talk over, neighbor," said Caleb, as Kate accompanied by Lena passed from the room. "I have thought it all over. I have engaged a couple of men to come tomorrow and fix up the fences and outbuildings. In the spring I will furnish you with a couple of teams and seed. You can have crops enough, if we have a good season, to meet your interest, defray your expenses, and perhaps save something to pay on the principal of the mortgages—I can see Arthur don't come home prepared to take them up or—ah, well——"

"I understand you, Marsh; you have not given up the hope of making Kate your wife. You have that end in view. You would yet release the mortgages if she consented."

"Every dollar, Abner; but it is too early to talk of it: She has had a great shock; but you can see for yourself. I am true to win her."

"You are bound to win her gratitude, Caleb, if not her love. I suppose then that but for the hope of winning her you would not have extended the mortgages at all."

"I don't say that, neighbor, you must not think of it. Of course, business is business; but I couldn't be hard on the father of the girl I love, whether she ever become my wife or not. Just let everything drift along as it will. I am willing to trust to time. And I must go on to town."

"I think her gratitude will impel her to become your wife, Caleb, if nothing else does. You couldn't well coerce her into marrying you."

"I wouldn't think of such a thing, neighbor. No, no! On no account. If I had that power I would not foreclose, and extend the mortgages until she had become my wife. Ah, no, no! Not for the world! I sought to have you coerce her. I tell you, Abner, I love her, and I am ready to vow now. You can come to Elwood if I get Kate! Now, good day. You will see me again."

"Good-by, Miss Kate! Anything I can do for you in town?"

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Marsh," said Kate, as she walked towards the front door where Marsh was standing. "But you are doing too much for us. But for my father's sake I suppose I must accept of favors. Pray, though, do not think me ungrateful."

"Why, I am glad to do it for your father's account you accept them, Miss Kate. But really, you overestimate them. I am going to town now, and may be back, but I save you that long walk, if there is anything I can bring. Ah, I see that you have a pencil and——"

"If I might ask you to inquire at the postoffice, and then I have a little list that I shall need from the grocery."

"By all means, girl, Miss Kate. Why, it will not delay me a moment, and if it will in the least relieve or increase the pleasure of serving you."

These words and the look that accompanied them confirmed Kate's mind in the idea that she had already formed, that Caleb yet intended to make her his wife, and that the extension of the mortgages and threatened foreclosure of her welfare were evidences of that intention.

With a sick heart she turned away, and in a moment returned with the list which she handed him.

"If you will please tell Mr. Hart, the grocer, that I will pay our bill when I come to see him."

"Certainly, Miss Kate, certainly; and if Lena does not suit you must let me know."

"I am sure she will prove very acceptable, I am sure," she replied. "It was very kind of you, good morning!"

"Let's see what this list comprises," thought Marsh, as his horse jogged along. "A pound of twenty-five pounds of flour and a strip of bacon. Thunder! A dozen large eggs, a hundred pounds of a time, and bacon, when he should have a smokehouse full. Shittless, shittless, even if he is an invalid. Here, a can of spirits of turpentine, and that will gain her consent to become my wife. Ah, folly, why, then I will have to be: 'Either sell out at mortgage, or I foreclose and your father goes to jail.' Look, there's a man! The idea is the best.

"Let's see, I must add to this list. No cows; they have no butter—never mind, I will send a tub of that from home; but what shall I add? Girls always like cake and sweet things. Two pounds of raisins, two of mixed nuts. Candy? Yes, two! Two pounds of mixed candy, five pounds of rice, one kit of mackerel, one ham. There, that's a mixture, and I may see something else.

"Gods! here's where the murder was committed! Go on, Prince, go on! It makes me shudder to pass this place. That grocer will notice that all the articles are not written down by a female hand. Well, time the difference. I think I will invest a little more of Mark's money today, and the way he would have me. No harm in that, even if I am not all the credit.

"Now, of course, I will inquire at the postoffice, and I have some letters that I will inquire every day when I am in town. Mark Perry dare not write; but there might be something that it would be to my advantage to see. Thunder! Horton might drop a line! I must be on guard.

It was nearly four o'clock when Kate heard a slight rap on the door. She had retired through the kitchen and entered. A large basket pile of packages and bundles confronted her, and Caleb Marsh was half-way back to his buggy.

"Why, Mr. Marsh!" called out Kate.

Caleb raised his hat: "You must excuse me, Miss Kate, but it is time I was home. You will find the packages all there. Good evening!" and he hastened on, and in a moment was driving rapidly away.

"Goodness!" exclaimed Kate, "I never ordered all these things! Why here is a kit of mackerel, too! What ails Caleb Marsh? Lena!"

"Yes, miss!"

"Help me bring this basket in. Gracious, it's heavy!"

"It should be," called out her father, "by the way Caleb was bent over carrying it. It's a bushel basket. The contents, I judge, will cause rejoicing!"

"Why, I only ordered five articles, and here are at least a dozen. Oh, here is an envelope. I suppose it contains the bill. Yes, here it is:

"To bills rendered—$24.09.

"Goods, as ordered delivered to Caleb Marsh this day—$18.50.

"Goodness, father, that man is crazy! We cannot afford that. Why, here is a list of the articles—Coffee, tea, sugar, bacon. I ordered those. But mercy! one ham, one kit mackerel, five pounds rice, one barrel flour, ten bars soap, six cakes toilet soap, two pounds candy, one gallon pickles, one pound smoking tobacco, one-half gross matches. Oh, father, there are lots of other articles, and the grocer adds that the flour will be delivered in the morning!

"Why, the total due is now fifty-two dollars and a half, and—here's the bill receipted! What can that mean? 'Payment received in full—Edward Hart.' Lena, will you please feed the chickens for me? Crazy, father! Mr. Marsh is crazy!"

A low laugh answered her. "Not a bit of it, Kate! Caleb Marsh loves you, and he yet hopes to make you his wife! Can't you see it? What but love for a charming girl could change a nature as hard and cold as his? He was the only one who ever found a way to his heart! You should be proud of your conquest!"

"He knows I never can become his wife, father."

"And loves you still, instead of seeking to crush us. For your sake, he is seeking to make our conditions more bearable. Marsh has certainly shown qualities I did not suppose he possessed! Well, when Arthur comes home he shall not be forgotten. He will have my son's gratitude to his dying day!"

"He certainly has mine, father; but my love is——"

Kate nearly pronounced the forbidden name—Jack Perry, and she choked back the tears that sprang to her eyes at thought of him, as she commenced unpacking the basket.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"HE HAS BEEN A SON TO ME."

During the winter months Caleb was a frequent visitor at Elwood farm, and on two occasions Sarah accompanied him. It is needless to state that she had been clad in her finest apparel. She had remained at Elwood until her mother had driven into town and returned; nor had she neglected to sound his praises with all her capacity.

"Caleb has for years been a misunderstood man," she had said. "His business methods have made him seemingly hard and cold, when in reality, a man with more feeling, a more tenderer, truer nature does not live. He is as gentle as a child to those he loves, and that is saying a good way in life. Miss Kate, the dear soul would almost worship one his own possessions.

"That is saying much of a man whose sole ambition in life heretofore, has been to acquire wealth for, he never had his heart in his younger days. But now, now it is for your possession! You have no idea how that man worships you! How he honors you for your devotion to your father. It is marvelous to me, who knows his nature so well.

"I can forgive how for your sake he hoped against hope that Mark Perry would not prove to be a murderer, and would establish his innocence. That very night, when he returned from town leaving the other man in jail, the cold-blooded murderer made his escape and there was no longer a chance for hope.

"Never mention his name again, Miss Marsh, in my presence, never! It is unforbidden that I should!" exclaimed Mr. Ellis.

"I do not wonder," said Sarah. "He nearly wrecked your lives—but of course he no longer holds a place in the esteem of your daughter?"

"What, a murderer? Impossible, madam!"

Kate, who had become very uncomfortable, turned away to hide the tears that would start to her eyes. "Lena, come with Mark!" her heart cried out. "You are not guilty, and I love you yet!"

"My heart is often sad," continued Sarah, "when I contemplate the lonely condition my poor brother is in, when I am called away. I am much older than my brother, you know, and my years must be near numbered. Oh, if I could but see him happily married to the charming girl he loves! Is not love, is not a home enough to content; but not winning her, my brother will never know. Love, I think, comes to such natures as his but once. It is——"

Here Sarah raised her handkerchief to her eyes, but peeped beneath, through the open door at Kate who was now setting the dining-room table to see if her words had had any effect on that young lady.

"Faint heart never won a fair lady," you know," observed the farmer in a low tone of voice. "I think Caleb is making progress. Your brother knows I do not oppose his suit. His course towards us, I think, would win a heart of stone. I would gladly see my Kate his wife, gladly!"

"Any young man in the land might be proud to become her wife," replied Sarah.

"True, true, but I don't think he need be discouraged. [illegible] he is many years Kate's senior, [illegible]

"Oh, better age than youth, darling, Mr. Ellis, than a younger man above. And then, Caleb is not so [illegible] He comes of a long-lived race. Such a man is young at forty-five."

Now all this conversation within the hearing of Kate, who had given all the love of her young heart to one who was now a fugitive from justice, pleased she became aware of it, though, that Sarah Marsh as well as her father favored Caleb's suit, and while she felt that her father would never try to coerce her into marrying Caleb, she knew that the time would come when the problem would again confront her.

"Either your hand, Miss Kate, or your father must give up Elwood!"

He is not strange now that he believes Mark a criminal, that having wished before Arthur's return to bestow a generosity to his enemies, that from his path, he seeks to remove all that is dear to him, and that given to Mark he overlooks—all men could not do that. Wish father would not accept Caleb's favors. Arthur would not! We have survived?

"Kate, excuse me there can be no doubt. I should be grateful for all he is doing for us, even if for no other reason than that he did not love me he would not have extended the mortgages. Even now we would be homeless. Oh, I am not the only one miserable! If Mr. Horton had but taken up Mark's cause, he would have won him to confine from him. He, too, must believe you guilty! How dreadful that love and blood between us and poverty. And yet, my heart rebels against him! Oh, the end! What will it be?

"The long winter months passed by, with Caleb yet as zealous in his attentions as the inmates of Elwood farmhouse as he was the month following the tragedy at Mark's cabin. The winter had been severe, the woodshed was from time to time replenished—in fact, he did many things, nothing, save the chopping and hauling; which Caleb knew Mark Perry was gratified to do. Hardly a trip did he make to town but that he found something that he thought would be to the comfort of Kate or his daughter; and then he always called at the cabin to see if Mark had any mail and to leave the papers.

"She can't refuse him after all this," he thought. "She will be bound to marry me through gratitude; but it will cost me more than Mark Perry's property. I know what I am about, and it is the best way."

The 4th of March was a day of storm accompanied by drivers to commence the spring's plowing. The weather by the time he had operated sufficiently to permit Abner to spend part of his time out of doors, and he grew more confident than when he saw four fine horses in his stables and plows and harrows that would have to be planted once more.

"Marsh, you are a true friend!" he exclaimed. "Why, I could not only come home this summer and find every acre of the old place plowed, but you have actually prepared to lift those mortgages, there will be a happy day for us, Kate and I! Arthur will have another man of you. It has softened your nature and brought out your better qualities. Ah, I see it all now, but that you'll win Kate. Yes, and then you'll relent to Mark Perry, if my son does not return by the time they are due."

"Certain, Caleb, certain! I will not violate my word. You think then that I am gaining headway with her?"

"I know it, Marsh. Isn't I always praising you, and don't I often hear her reply, 'Yes, Caleb,' 'No, Caleb,' 'Oh, Caleb,' 'Mr. Marsh?' Of course, she knows that it is because you hope to make her your wife, that I relent to her every wish, and that was in your actions. Oh, you will win her."

"I am drowned if you don't let out of this, if I don't," thought Caleb, "to my sorrow of the expense. Well, the farm will be worth it, and I'll have the girl anyway."

Thus the first of April Mr. Ellis had an unusually poor spell, and Kate, becoming alarmed, sent for Caleb, who, fortunately, was in town to visit him.

It was chilling and the lamps were lighted in the house when the doctor arrived. He had called at Elwood but once with Mark's wife, Caleb said, and that was the day following that event.

"This is no business, Mr. Ellis," he had said, "and you must not worry. I can arrange about it that I am unable to fathom; but enough of that. Mark Perry is guilty, and I do not believe him guilty of that murder."

"His name is forbidden here from henceforth," replied the farmer. "His flight is proof of guilt," and the farmer changed the subject.

"He is ashamed that his daughter was engaged to become Mark's wife," thought the doctor. "Well, time may develop many things."

Now on this occasion the doctor found Abner propped in his recliner chair, suffering from an attack of asthma with which he was frequently troubled.

"Oh, I shall soon have you out of this," he said. "It is nothing serious. I judge from the cold you have taken, much on the farm now that you have plows running through it. Everything seems to have taken a new life at Elwood."

"It has, doctor, it has, and all because of the kindness of Caleb Marsh! No son could have been more attentive to us than he has been."

"Son? Brother, you mean," observed the doctor. "You could scarcely have a son of his age—but, you surprise me! I always supposed Marsh incapable of caring for the needs or necessities of others."

"I mean son, as I said," exclaimed the farmer. "Caleb is only in his thirties. And you, doctor, he has been a misunderstood man. He might have been the owner of Elwood right now, and would have had he not extended the mortgages that hang over the place and given me another chance. And that after my daughter had declined the honor of becoming his wife."

"Declined the honor of becoming his wife! You amazed me! Is it possible that that old crab sought the hand of your lovely daughter? I do not wonder that she declined him, for—for——"

"Not a word against Marsh, doctor! I can't hear it. He has been my best friend since this trouble arose. I would not be quite content to see Kate wedded to him. No one will ever know all he has done for us."

"He is amply secured for all he has expended, I presume," said the doctor.

"Secured! You don't know, doctor! Of course, his mortgages cover the amount he loaned on the farm and the interest which is long behind, but he has nothing to show for two hundred dollars in cash that he has loaned us, besides the use of his horses to defray household expenses with—nothing to show for as much more that he has paid out for seed, etc. Why, when we crowded me, his teams have kept us supplied with meat, and he has done everything for us, and father, while he will not urge me, would be a happy man if I were to wed Caleb Marsh. He is a most estimable man!

"Best not let the alternative arise again," said Mr. Ellis, Kate, or Sarah. "For I am to become his wife, it had better be Kate. She is more suited to his disposition. Oh, my poor old father! Only for you, a dozen Elwoods would hardly induce me to marry Caleb Marsh, though I do think that man loves me. Strange! No, I don't think that, I am either! Mark used to say I was handsome. I wonder if I am?"

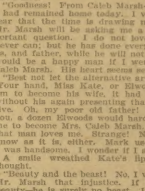
A smile wreathed Kate's lips at the thought.

"Beauty and the beast! No, I will not do Mr. Marsh that injustice. He is not a beauty—he is surely no beast. I will venture he will be good to me, and permit me his money, but there are lots of things I need, Oh, Mark! how far apart a few hours thrust us, and never to meet again."

It was three o'clock when Caleb accom-

(Continued on page fourteen.)

ELEGANT LACE and EMBROIDERY TRIMMED WHITE WAIST 94c



WHERE TO BUY SAME KIND GREAT FREE FASHION BOOKLET

MONEY Made quickly by smart men. P. Cooper, 111 Nassau St., N.Y.

DETECTIVES Shrewd, reliable men wanted in every locality to act under orders; no office experience necessary. Write, stating age. Am. Detective Sys., Indianapolis, Ind.

Evelyn Nesbit FOOT CHARM, 25 different poses, 10 for 10c.; 30 for 25c. Cosmo Mfg. Co., Dept. 1436 E 1036 W. Adams St., Chicago.

PATENTS. Send for Inventor's Primer, Wills E. Simons & Co., Patent Attorneys, 1208 F Street, Washington, D.C. Established 1864. Branches: Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit

SONG "HIT" will make you rich. Send us your song poem or melody for free examination. We accept only meritorious songs. WATSON-NEWTON MUSIC CO., 1 Columbus Circle, New York.

GENUINE TAFFETA PETTICOAT of excellent quality, in black, navy, gray, $2.50 value, special for $1.98. Send for free catalog of "GOOD "BEAUTY FITS" ABSOLUTELY FREE. Write Queen Quality Co., 1 Queen St., Racine, Wis.

OPIUM or Morphine Habit cured, Free trial treatment. We spare you the pain. Many under our supervision failed. Confidential. Write. Dr. B. M. Woolley, Atlanta, Ga.

CORNS

CORNS WILL COME BACK every time you pare them. Stop suffering. Remove the whole corn, roots and all. Quick, safe, sure. Use only Gyrene, the new discovery. Sold by druggists or by mail.

Giant Chemical Co., Philadelphia.

McGINTY WATCH

Strongest 25c watch ever sold. Looks like a regular watch. Pocket leather case with chain. Open and shut face. Stem wind and set. Guaranteed for 1 year. Sent by mail, postpaid, for 25c. Or for 75c, postage paid, 3 watches and 3 chains. Send for free catalog of watches, jewelry, novelties, etc. Agents wanted.

UNITED SPECIALTY CO., 56 Dearborn St., Dept. 97, Chicago

A UNIVERSAL FOOD

Following Nature's Footsteps.

"I have a boy two years old, weighing forty pounds and in perfect health who has been raised on Grape-Nuts and milk.

"This is an ideal food and evidently furnishes the elements necessary for a baby as well as for adults. We have used Grape-Nuts in large quantities and greatly to our advantage."

One advantage about Grape-Nuts Food is that it is pre-digested in the process of manufacture; that is, the starch contained in the wheat and barley is transformed into grape-sugar by exactly the same method as this process is carried out in the human body, that is, by the use of moisture and long exposure to moderate warmth, which grows the diastase in the grains and makes the remarkable change from starch to grape-sugar.

Therefore, the most delicate stomach can handle Grape-Nuts and the food is quickly absorbed into the blood and tissue, certain parts of it going directly to building and nourishing the brain and nerve centers. "There's a Reason."

Made at the pure food factories of the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich. Read the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Then She Wept.

Mrs. Newlived—I made a big batch of these biscuits today.

Mr. Newlived—You did, indeed, dear.

Mrs. Newlived—How do you know how big a batch I made?

Mr. Newlived—Oh, I thought you said "botch."

Jack—You are holding your parasol on the wrong side to protect you from the sun.

Roslyn—Yes, I know it; but there is that horrid Miss Soub, and I want her to see my new hat.

Encouraging.

He had been worshiping at her shrine for several moons, but was somewhat backward about coming forward.

"No," he said one evening when they were alone in the parlor, "I never had a sister and I don't believe I'd care to have one."

"Well," she rejoined in a tone redolent with encouragement, "you'll never have a better opportunity to not get one."

Never Touched Him.

"Now, sir," said the irate creditor, "I'll ask you for the last time when you intend to pay me?"

"Well, thank goodness," rejoined Slopay, "that's the last time I'll hear that silly chestnut."

Out Completely.

"The truth will out," we're told, and, oh,
How frequently we find
The truth will out of some men so
It leaves no trace behind!

Why It Was Boiled.

Mrs. Outskirts—Is it really true that you boil the city water before using it?

Mr. Park Rowe—Yes, you see it's not quite thick enough to bake or fry.

Post Cards Get a set of Comic Post Cards and send them to your friends. Every card new, colored and a comic. 25 cards, 25 comic 25c. No. 2, 50 for 25 cts. No. 10, 100 for 25 cents per 25. Address CLYDE L. GALBRAITH, Emlenton, Pa.

JOKES AND Sensible.

The One—Where are you from, stranger?

The Other—I'm from St. Louis.

The One—Shake! I'm always glad to meet a sensible man.

The Other—How do you know I am sensible?

The One—The fact that you are from St. Louis proves it. Otherwise you would be there yet.

The Saddest Words.

Of all sad words of tongue or pen
The saddest are those to the bargain maid:
"They have cut the price in two again,
And it's twice as cheap as what I paid!"

How He Proposed.

Mr. McDooley—Faith, an' it do be a question Oi have for yez, me darlin'.

Miss Clancey—Pfwat is it, Pat?

Mr. McDooley—Whin it comes toime for me funeral, how would yez loike t' be th' Widder McDooley?

His Idea of It.

Teacher—Earlie, what is capital punishment?

Earlie—It's when a kid is naughty and his mother locks him in a dark closet where there's plenty of cake.

Egotistical.

Him—Won't you give me just one kiss?

Her—Yes. I'll give you one—if you'll promise to not ask for another.

Him—Oh, after the first one you'll do the asking.

Mrs. Meekton—What do you think, James? Mother says she wants to be cremated.

James—All right; tell her to get her things on, and I'll take her down now.

The Captain Kicks.

"Dis mollycoddle business makes me tired," grumbled Tommy Tuff, captain of the Gashouse nine.

"What are you talking about, sonny?" asked the man who was waiting for a car. "Why isn't your team playing today?"

"Why ain't dey playin', mister? I'll tell you why dey ain't playin'. Half de kids had to wash dishes dis morning and der hands are so soft dey couldn't hold anyt'ing harder den a codfish ball. What's de nation comin' to anyway?"

And the captain of the Gashouse nine was so disgusted he tossed his bat at the speckled goat and went home.

Her First Thought.

When an automobile runs over a man,
He rants and swears as loud as he can;
And feels for the skin that is peeled from his face,
And vows that his ribs are out of place;
But a woman don't hunt for bruises or swear;
Just shrieks: "You chump, you've mussed my hair!"

Within the Law.

Wild-eyed Man—I want a lot of poison, right off.

Drug Clerk—It's against the law to sell poison to people who look as if they want to commit suicide; but I'll let you have a bottle of Doctor Black-Sequin's Elixir of Life. That seems to be pretty sure deal.

Disappointed.

Inquisitive—If, as you say, you knew this man to be a rake, why did you invite him to your house?

Henpeck—Heavens, man! I never dreamed he would elope with my daughter; I thought he would carry off my wife.

She—You always talk about such silly things.

He—I'm always talking about you.

The Wife Knew.

Mrs. Hayfork (in country postoffice)—Anything for me?

Postmaster—I don't see nothin'.

Mrs. Hayfork—I was expectin' a letter or post-card from Aunt Spriggs, tellin' what day she was comin'.

Rural Postmaster (calling to his wife)—Did ye see a post-card from Mrs. Hayfork's Aunt Sally, tellin' what day she was comin'.

His Wife—Yes. She's comin' on Thursday.

My eyes and nose are filled with dust,
My face begrimed with smut;
My fingers are all badly smashed,
My mouth is full of soot.

My knees are [illegible] of tacks,
My back is full of pain,
My temper, too, is ruffled up—
I'm cleaning house again.

He Was a Thinker.

"My good man," said the lady missionary, "do you ever pause to think where you are going?"

"Sure, I'm," replied the unlaundered hobo. "If I didn't I might git on de wrong freight an' land back at me startin' place!"

Striking an Average.

Jenkins—Smarity has bought an absolutely noiseless auto.

Woodson—Indeed.

Jenkins—Yes. And he's got the noisiest horn in town attached to it.

No Health There.

Mrs. De Fashion—So you were at Health Springs during the summer. How did you like it?

Mrs. De Style—Well, the place is pretty enough, but I didn't think much of the water. It didn't taste bad at all.

Anticipation and Realization.

"There's always more joy in anticipation than in realization."

"I don't know."

"Have you never realized it?"

"I don't know; I am anticipating a visit from my mother-in-law."

Cause and Effect.

Passenger—You say there was a big washout on this road last week.

Conductor—Yes.

Passenger—Huh! Some of the water must have leaked out of the stock.

JOLLITY

Doctor Killum—You should send your mother-in-law to a warmer climate.

Nervous—You do it, doctor, with chloroform or something; nobody will suspect you.

Pessimistic.

Marriage is a problem
That's difficult to face;
At best a doubtful heaven,
At worst—the other place.
The motives that inspire it
Are more or less complex;
Chief among them is the bunch
Of the fools in either sex.

The Limit.

Biggs—The Dopsons are very exclusive, I understand.

Diggs—Yes, indeed. Why, they even have wire screens on their doors and windows so their flies can't get out and associate with the flies of their neighbors.

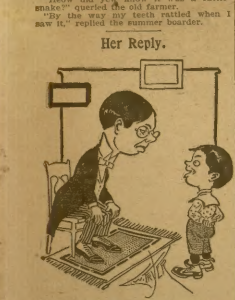
As Indicated.

"I saw a rattlesnake fifteen feet long this morning," said the summer boarder.

"How did you know it was a rattlesnake?" queried the old farmer.

"By the way my teeth rattled when I saw it," replied the summer boarder.

Her Reply.



Percy—Willie, did you—aw—tell your sister that I am waiting?

Willie—Sure.

Percy—And what did she—aw—say?

Willie—She said you ought to get a job like that in a restaurant.

Dark Future for Baby.

"How much do you ask for a bathtub for a child?"

"From $1.69 to $10."

"W-h-e-w! Well have to go on washing baby in the coal scuttle till the prices come down."

Old-Fashioned Skimming.

Manufacturer—Didn't have much success in selling the farmers automobiles, eh? Then they didn't care much about skimming along at a great speed?

Salesman—No; about all they care about skimming is milk.

Quick Point.

Jim—I hear you had a quarrel with your telephone girl.

Jack—Yes, she [illegible] our engagement.

Jim—What did she say?

Jack—Ring off.

The Tailor's Joke.

"Are you sure this piece of cloth will stand wear?" asked the man who was selecting a spring suit.

Yes, sir," replied the tailor. "Why, we call that kind of cloth 'mystery.'"

"Why so?"

"Because it is so hard to unravel."

Professional Advice.

"What your husband needs most," said the family physician, "is complete rest."

"Where would you advise us to go?" queried Mrs. Gabbleton.

"I'd advise him to stay right here at home," replied the M. D. "That is, if you can arrange to go away for a few weeks."

Miss Tapp—I heard you say she had a complexion like a doll.

Mr. Nocker—Perhaps you did.

Miss Tapp—But a doll's complexion won't stand water.

Mr. Nocker—Neither will hers.

Professional.

"Are you certain you can cook well?"

"Madam, I worked two years for the great tenor Alberti. At the last dinner he gave I was applauded after each course, and at the end of the dinner I was recalled three times."

Absent Minded.

"You have three pairs of glasses, professor?"

"Yes, I use one to read with, one to see at a distance, and the third to find the other two."

By a Cynic.

Fair woman's mind is ever clean,
Whichever way she ranges it;
Which is her natural, I ween,
For she so often changes it.

Maria and the Echo.

"So you and your wife visited the Mammoth cave on your honeymoon?" said the close friend.

"Yes," replied Mr. Stubb, reminiscently, "and, by gum, we had to pull Maria out of the cave forcibly."

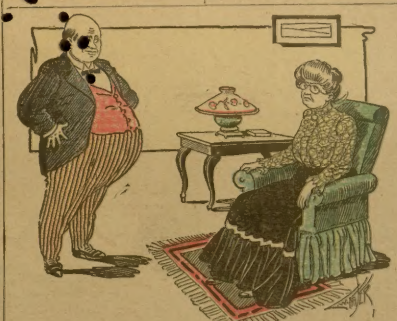
"Gracious! I suppose she was fascinated with the beautiful stalactites?"

"No, it wasn't the stalactites. You see there is a wonderful echo in the cave and Maria couldn't bear to think of the echo having the last word."

Room for a Bushel.

Jack—It takes a large measure to hold a bushel, doesn't it?

Eva—Not always. A girl can send a bushel of kisses in the smallest envelope you ever saw.



Mrs. Fussbub—No, John, if you should die I should never marry again.

Mr. Fussbub—Ah, my dear, I am glad you think there is no one like your old hubby.

Mrs. Fussbub—Oh, no; it isn't that. I am afraid there might be another like him.

Mean Man.

"George," chirped the young wife at breakfast, "I read where some loving and poetical husband actually wrote a poem on his wife's biscuits. Now, dear, if you want to pay me a pretty compliment, why don't you write a poem on the biscuits that I bake?"

"It would be impossible," laughed the cruel husband.

"And why, George?"

"Because the biscuit you make are so hard they wouldn't take the hint."

And then the trouble began.

On the Honeymoon.

"So you were well pleased with the train on which you took your wedding trip?" said the bosom friend. "Was it an accommodation train?"

The young man's face beamed with delight.

"I should say it was an accommodation train," he confided. "Why, the porter put the lights out every time we reached a tunnel."

AGENTS WANTED

Nearly all the readers of THE LEDGER will find these advertisements of interest to them. There will be found among them some excellent chances of making money by selling goods to friends, neighbors and others. Those seeking such an opportunity either as a regular or temporary occupation, should write the advertisers whose offers follow.

MAKE MONEY EASY

Agents wanted in every country to sell the popular Novelty Kalweseit; name, address, photo, lock-and-key etc., on locket. Rapid stamp for catalogue. AGENTS EARN $75 to $300 A MONTH. (We shave you here.)

Big profits—quick sales—exclusive territory. Write quick for our liberal money making special offer. Sample 25c; new outfit showing 4 styles, 50c. Catalogue, colors for lady agents. NOVELTY CUTLERY CO., 345 BAR STREET, CANTON, O.

AGENTS, CREDIT, Perfumes, Flavors, etc. Big profits. Express Paid. Terms Free. $5 Sample & Outfit Free. Dept. 202, Star's 4, New York

"NO BURN" SMOKE FIXTURE Agents Wanted. STAMPING CO., ANDOVER, N. Y.

$150. A MONTH PROFIT E. S. ROBERTS, new patented Burner. Gives 700 CP LIGHT. Sells on sight. Sample, $1. L. L. BULL, 1437 Penn Ave., Pittsburg, Pa.

SELL TOBACCO AND CIGARS. Locally or traveling. Full lines or side lines. Steady work. Good pay. Promotion. Address NORFOLK TOBACCO WORKS, Box 5 D, PORTSMOUTH, VA.

AGENTS PORTRAITS 25c, FRAMES 15c, views 1c. 30 days credit. Samples & Catalog Free. Consolidated Portrait Co., 326-W. Adams St., Chicago.

AUTOMATIC FISH HOOKS Catches two fish to common hook's one. Fish are caught in every locality. Write to-day for free sample. ROCK FISH Mfg. Co., Agents wanted. Rock Specialty Co., Dept. 69, Rock Specialty Co., Joplin, Mo.

Energetic Men Wanted

in every town throughout the United States to advertise our goods, tacking up show cards on trees, fences and along roads, also distributing small advertising matter; commission or salary $12 per week and all expenses $4 per day. Steady employment; no experience required. Write for particulars. Address W. H. B. WARNER MEDICINE CO., London, Canada.

AGENTS WANTED

200 Per Cent Profit. Sell our Big $1.00 bottle Sarsaparilla for 85 cts. Need no capital. Finest Holiday Combine With Pure Drug Law. Everyone buys. Write now for terms. P. R. GREENE, 27 Lake St., Chicago

WE WANT AGENTS

in every town to take orders for Custom-made Suits and Overcoats from $14.95 up, or Dress Skirts from $4.95 up. Big commissions paid and large bonus credit to reserving time furnished free to those who mean business. You can make big money working for us. Write at once for handsome outfit. The Progress Tailoring Co., Dept. 509, 316 Adams St., Chicago.

AGENTS Learn to fit glasses by sending for our book on the eye. It will tell you all about it. A business that pays you from $70.00 to $100.00 per month without fail; the right profession for men or for you. No deal or canvassing. Our graduates are in every large town and we want to add one also as a salaried agent. Every agent should have the FLEXIBLE EYE BOOK. In writing say whether you are a man or woman, your age, and how long you have lived at present address. ILLINOIS OPTICAL COLLEGE, Dept. 7, JACKSON BOULEVARD

BIG MAIL FREE!

Would you like to get a lot of letters, circulars and postpaid? You probably have a mailing list of names of persons, schools and publishers by name and address for the purpose of sending samples, advertising matter, papers and circulars. If you have one and address are hard to get and are quite expensive. We publish AGENTS DIRECTORY LIST containing 2,000 addresses carefully arranged in alphabetical order. We will send it to you free if you or someone we know wishes for good names to send advertising matter to. Write your name very plainly as the printer will not make out unless he sees to give your street number and town also plainly written so that any mail addressed to you will reach you without delay. If you will send us your name for the Agents Directory List for several years and refer to the editor of this paper who will tell you we are reliable. All we ask is that you send 10 cents in silver and we will enter your name in our Agents' Directory List as above stated. Write today. Address AGENTS DIRECTORY LIST, INDIANA, Indiana County, PENNA.

When answering advertisements you will favor the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

By WILLIAM H. MANNING.

THE TREASURE BEARERS;

Or THE HAWK OF THE FURLAND.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

Begun in No. 20, May 18. Subscriptions can begin with that issue, or back copies can be obtained from any newsdealer, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER XX.

DARKNESS AND DANGER.

It was midnight. The air was balmy, and more than unobscured in the heavens. Inanimate nature seemed to sleep. Yet, the woods had their sounds. The four-footed creatures prowled, and they stirred, leaf, plant and branch as they went. Under their feet dry limbs cracked and loosened stones rolled. Of their number some were beasts that threaded the wilds in search of prey.

But the woods were not wholly given up to the brute order. By the lake shore was a thicket, and in the thicket crouched a human being who kept a weary vigil.

After the treasure had been buried on the point by Lazare Colot he had guided Helen on to the mainland, chosen by Jason and his immediate followers. There, after a period of inactivity, it was determined that, despite all risks, Lazare should go to Spur Island for tidings of Roger Stevens, by avoid discovery the way must be made circuitous, long and weary. He must swim long stretches, so Helen could not keep him company.

Both knew this, but Lazare admitted it with great reluctance.

All other devices failing, they went two miles from Jason's camp, and there Lazare took his departure, while Helen remained in hiding.

Since then hours had passed. Day had waned and gone. Night had come and far advanced. And still the voyageur remained away. In his mind's eye the girl had long since given place to acute fear. Fully persuaded that some great serious had happened to Lazare, she dared not leave her cover, and yet feared to stay.

In this painful crisis Barbe was her one comfort and protector. In both respects he was a strong tower, and he had been an uneasy as she. He had mixed periods of stolid composure with minutes of great restlessness. At times his eyes were full of dancing light, his nose outstretched and his muzzle a-quiver. Often she discovered that this was caused by the wild things of the forest, but, sometimes she was wholly at fault, and Barbe could tell that what was in his mind.

His restless manner grew with night, and the comfort of his presence was slipping by the fear that his manner heralded the coming of human foes.

Midnight arrived without trouble, but a change was at hand. Again the night had a voice and the woods new sounds. Something moved to the north Barbe stirred and growled softly. His pelted head was thrust forward, his powerful body quivered. Helen shivered, but kept her arm in its old position around him, and mechanically caressed him.

The sounds grew in volume and came nearer. She peered out of her cover and saw distinctly the figure of a man. He moved forward, and after him came others. Dark shadows of the dark forest, they spread out fan-fashion and covered a considerable strip of ground.

And they seemed to be searching for something.

Helen was filled with terror. Convinced that they were her foes, she shivered and was powerless to move. That which made Barbe's murderous fangs gleam was lax. She was ready to sink with fright.

The leading man passed a few yards away.

"Hurry on!" he directed.

Helen gasped weakly. It was the voice of Jason Bardell.

"Combat following!" growled a second man, and she knew it was Louis Gouin who had spoken.

"We are wasting time," added Jason, irritably. "Lazare Colot is dead or confined on land. Get out of the bushes at once and let us hasten!"

"Have your own way, stubborn-head!" snapped Gouin.

The leader, his speed, blundering along recklessly and crashed through the bushes angrily.

Helen barely suppressed a cry. His course had taken him near her cover. She quivered and was helpless, but Barbe quivered and was full of intelligence. Brave and faithful, ever ready to die for his mistress if need be, the wolf-blood in his veins responded to excitement. He was full of ferocity as his wilder ancestors.

Quiet and patient he had been.

There was a deep growl, a forward leap, and the voyageur fell back prostrate with the dog at his throat.

The calm of the preceding minutes was lost in confusion. Barbe's fierce attack on the dog were mingled the wild cries for help from Lazare Colot, who had been set upon medley.

For a little while even Jason lost his power for coherent thought, but he soon discerned that it was no wood animal they had to deal with, and a suspicion of the truth flashed over him.

"To the rescue!" he yelled. "Forward, Carrel, forward Deroux!"

Gouin echoed the invitation, and then there was a general dash to the scene of trouble. Unarmed, the voyageur fell victim to the mêlée, and into the trouble. Louis Gouin called for help no longer, and Barbe was free. He met the new assailants with fangs that was knocked down by his rush, and Deroux and Carrel were soon acting as his shield. Then, when Tiery Carrel would have used his knife, he found the weapon held by the deadly jaws and the weapon fell.

The assailants soon had enough. It seemed to them that a fiend had been loosed in the thicket. A sharp set of teeth and a valley of gnashing fangs met them at every corner and in all places between. They who had attempted to use their hands went out far more rapidly. A rush, a confusion of outcries, an eager use of legs and feet, and they were in full retreat and anxious to keep at it.

Jason Gouin remained behind.

The fight, and the husky breathing that came from where Barbe crouched, was not too much for Helen. She found the power of motion; she sprang to her feet; she rolled in the dust of the path and the darker forest. The bushes parted and she was gone.

A red, two, three rods she went heedlessly, and then a little further toward her aim. She looked down and saw Barbe. He trod beside her with the same step, and if the fire of battle still burned in his veins he gave no sign of it. Yet he had eyes for all around them, and his ears were keen. It had been less his fangs might have been seen gleaming between the white and yellow fangs that had dragged Gouin down and put Jason to flight.

Helen went aimlessly. She did not realize that she had taken the way to the heart of the forest, nor did she pause to reason as to what consequences would follow. Her one idea was to get away from Jason Bardell, and her course was a wild, aimless flight.

On, and on she over rocks and logs, through thickets and brooks, down hill and up acclivities in long-continued haste. And where she went Barbe kept her company.

When she stayed her steps it was because nature had been drawn upon to the limit. Weary weak, breathless, exhausted, she dropped to the ground and lay panting and shrinking.

Barbe came and stood over her. For a time he whimpered as if a human mind directed him, but, presently, he ceased this useless exhibition and fell to licking her face to tell of his dog love and devotion. She reached up, she clasped her arms around his neck, and, hugging him close, broke into husky speech.

"Oh, Barbe, brave noble and good and brave! I live, and owe all to you. My friend, my champion! Good dog, good dog! —heaven gave you to me for my salvation, Barbe, Barbe!"

She fell to sobbing for love of him and from gratitude, as she had sobbed a moment before from pure nervousness; and though he did not have the power of understanding every word, Barbe gave responsive affection in his dog-fashion and was happy.

Presently he lay down by her side, and she pillowed her head on his shaggy shoulder and breathed a sigh of deep relief. Despite all that the partisan had told her in the past concerning the dog she had not before realized how great his strength, spread out fan-fashion and covered a considerable strip of ground.

And they seemed to be searching for something.

Helen was filled with terror. Convinced that they were her foes, she shivered and was powerless to move. That which made Barbe's murderous fangs gleam was lax. She was ready to sink with fright.

The leading man passed a few yards away.

"Hurry on!" he directed.

Helen gasped weakly. It was the voice of Jason Bardell.

"Combat following!" growled a second man, and she knew it was Louis Gouin who had spoken.

"We are wasting time," added Jason, irritably. "Lazare Colot is dead or confined on land. Get out of the bushes at once and let us hasten!"

"Have your own way, stubborn-head!" snapped Gouin.

The leader, his speed, blundering along recklessly and crashed through the bushes angrily.

Helen barely suppressed a cry. His course had taken him near her cover. She quivered and was helpless, but Barbe quivered and was full of intelligence. Brave and faithful, ever ready to die for his mistress if need be, the wolf-blood in his veins responded to excitement. He was full of ferocity as his wilder ancestors.

Quiet and patient he had been.

There was a deep growl, a forward leap, and the voyageur fell back prostrate with the dog at his throat.

The calm of the preceding minutes was lost in confusion. Barbe's fierce attack on the dog were mingled the wild cries for help from Lazare Colot, who had been set upon medley.

For a little while even Jason lost his power for coherent thought, but he soon discerned that it was no wood animal they had to deal with, and a suspicion of the truth flashed over him.

"To the rescue!" he yelled. "Forward, Carrel, forward Deroux!"

Gouin echoed the invitation, and then there was a general dash to the scene of trouble. Unarmed, the voyageur fell victim to the mêlée, and into the trouble. Louis Gouin called for help no longer, and Barbe was free. He met the new assailants with fangs that was knocked down by his rush, and Deroux and Carrel were soon acting as his shield. Then, when Tiery Carrel would have used his knife, he found the weapon held by the deadly jaws and the weapon fell.

The assailants soon had enough. It seemed to them that a fiend had been loosed in the thicket. A sharp set of teeth and a valley of gnashing fangs met them at every corner and in all places between. They who had attempted to use their hands went out far more rapidly. A rush, a confusion of outcries, an eager use of legs and feet, and they were in full retreat and anxious to keep at it.

Jason Gouin remained behind.

The fight, and the husky breathing that came from where Barbe crouched, was not too much for Helen. She found the power of motion; she sprang to her feet; she rolled in the dust of the path and the darker forest. The bushes parted and she was gone.

A red, two, three rods she went heedlessly, and then a little further toward her aim. She looked down and saw Barbe. He trod beside her with the same step, and if the fire of battle still burned in his veins he gave no sign of it. Yet he had eyes for all around them, and his ears were keen. It had been less his fangs might have been seen gleaming between the white and yellow fangs that had dragged Gouin down and put Jason to flight.

Helen went aimlessly. She did not realize that she had taken the way to the heart of the forest, nor did she pause to reason as to what consequences would follow. Her one idea was to get away from Jason Bardell, and her course was a wild, aimless flight.

On, and on she over rocks and logs, through thickets and brooks, down hill and up acclivities in long-continued haste. And where she went Barbe kept her company.

When she stayed her steps it was because nature had been drawn upon to the limit. Weary weak, breathless, exhausted, she dropped to the ground and lay panting and shrinking.

Barbe came and stood over her. For a time he whimpered as if a human mind directed him, but, presently, he ceased this useless exhibition and fell to licking her face to tell of his dog love and devotion. She reached up, she clasped her arms around his neck, and, hugging him close, broke into husky speech.

"Oh, Barbe, brave noble and good and brave! I live, and owe all to you. My friend, my champion! Good dog, good dog! —heaven gave you to me for my salvation, Barbe, Barbe!"

She fell to sobbing for love of him and from gratitude, as she had sobbed a moment before from pure nervousness; and though he did not have the power of understanding every word, Barbe gave responsive affection in his dog-fashion and was happy.

Presently he lay down by her side, and she pillowed her head on his shaggy shoulder and breathed a sigh of deep relief. Despite all that the partisan had told her in the past concerning the dog she had not before realized how great his strength, spread out fan-fashion and covered a considerable strip of ground.

Soon, too, her danger seemed to grow less, and the shadows of her situation to lighten and draw away. Calmness succeeded fear, and trouble was forgotten. Sleep lapped session of the inland goods? Where can you sell these?"

"We can use them."

The speaker was Jameson's traitorous voyageur, Pascal. False to the lawyer, he and Georges now aspired to overthrow Jason and, with the more ignorant Chippewas whom they might perhaps dupe later was—whom they might perhaps dupe later was—whom they might perhaps dupe later was—

RARE SHOE BARGAINS

JOHN M. SMYTH CO. Madison Street, CHICAGO

SONG POEMS WANTED, $100 Prize Offered for Complete Song. Free Booklet. Publish and Popularize. Advice. Examination Free. Send Poems to-day. GEO. JAEGER MUSIC CO. 163 W. 7th St., Cincinnati, O.

PATENTS SECURED OR FEE Returned. Free Opinion as to Patentability. Guide Book, and List of Inventions Wanted, sent free. EVANS, WILKENS & CO., Washington, D. C.

MAKE MONEY BY RAISING POULTRY. Pleasant and Profitable Work. ... I reprint, with each yearly subscription to COMMERCIAL POULTRY, a fifty-page book, bound in cloth. Price $1. Box 88, Commercial Poultry Publishing Company, Evanston, Ill.

Print Your Own Cards Circulars, books, newspaper, Outfits, $5 up. Press for Printing Cards, etc. Money saved. Rules sent. Write factory for outfit. Type, cards, paper, etc. KELSEY CO., Meriden, Conn.

X-RAY CATHODOSCOPE Latest pocket curiosity out. Everybody wants it. Thousands in use. Sent prepaid, with each yearly subscription to COMMERCIAL POULTRY, a fifty-page book, bound in cloth. Price $1. Box 88, Commercial Poultry Publishing Company, Evanston, Ill.

YOUR FORTUNE Send lock of hair or piece of cloth, state age, sex and 10c. silver and receive your horoscope by return mail. Prof. LEO AMES, Box 1, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

MORPHINE FREE TRIAL TREATMENT Opium and all drug habits. Painless. Permanent Home Cure. Nervous and physical disorders fully restored in three days. Write for free book and full treatment sent on trial. Write to-day. DR. J. E. HAMILTON, Suite 1501-460 Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill.

MEN WANTED in every locality in United States with rig or capable of buying horses to call on consumers, dealing up show cards in all conspicuous places, and distributing small advertising matter. Steady employment; salary $90 a month and expenses $3.00 a day. Steady employment to good energetic men. Spare time may do. Permanent position. Address, with stamp, THE STANDARD REMEDY COMPANY, London, Ontario, Canada.

MENDING TISSUE The WONDER of the Ages. No sewing or darning. Suppose a tear or hole in your clothing, carpets, furniture, oil cloth, linoleum, rubber coats, mackintoshes, umbrellas, parasols, stockings, etc. Package, postpaid, 10 cents; 3 packages, 25 cents. Address: your nearest druggist or PARAGON TISSUE CO., Paragon Building, Toledo, Ohio.

We Supply the U. S. Government. Prices Cut in Half to introduce. Our large new 80-page Band Instrument Catalog, Free. Write for it. THE RUDOLPH WURLITZER CO. 323-325 E. 4th St. Cincinnati, O. 217 Wabash Ave. Chicago, Ill.

30 DAYS FREE TRIAL ... DO NOT BUY ... ONE CENT ... Sundries at Factory Prices. MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 758 CHICAGO

ELGIN, WALTHAM ... When answering advertisements you will ever the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

THE BALLOON BOYS;

Or, THE WIZARDS OF THE AIR. By COL. LAWRENCE LESLIE.

[Copyright by the Author.]

Begun in No. 23, June 8. Subscriptions can begin with that issue or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER VII.
THE RIVALS OF THE CLOUDS.

It was a glorious morning.

Swiftly the gas monster, freed from attachment with mother earth, sprang aloft. The last words they heard below was the amazed shout of the officer as he cut the balloon cavity free right above the hall fest so confident of arresting.

Below them the town was still sleeping, though the gray of dawn had begun to spread around, cornering the traps of darkness and crushing them like wolves into dens.

Lights shone here and there, for it was a bustling town, where manufacturing was carried on to a considerable extent.

The spectacle was a wonderful one.

Objects could just be distinguished as they ascended into space.

There were the glowing eyes of the mills that kept working night after day.

There the white mist hugging the lower strata tells where the river wound its way to the sea.

An express train was rumbling over the prairie, a long, thoughtful looking weird and uncanny in the uncertain stage of early dawn.

As they ascended, the light around them grew stronger.

Finally the constantly widening horizon they could note the approach of the sun's rays, and soon the orb was visible from a mountain top long before those in the valley can see it.

They were now half a mile above the surface of the earth.

The town no longer lay below.

Although it was the first time they started, they had not mounted far into the realms of space before a breeze was met that wafted them in a northerly direction.

The town was being left behind.

Both boys leaned eagerly over the edge of the basket and looked.

They had more than an ordinary interest in this scene.

As for Petite Barbara, she had shrunk back, quite evidently afraid outwards, and crouched in the bottom of the basket, holding her eyes with her hands.

It was a new, a novel and terrifying sensation for the child—to mount in the balloon in midair can be compared to nothing else under Heaven, for even the pitching or tossing of a ship on the stormy deep gives one no conception of the peculiar sensation of being hurled into space.

"Look!" cried Pete suddenly.

He had grasped his companion's arm and was looking backward in the quarter where lay the little town, pointing eagerly as though he had discovered a spot of great importance.

What he saw became visible to Bob at about the same instant.

The other boy.

Then the pursuit had begun.

Bob felt a spasm of reproach because he had taken Petite Barbara into this flight of danger. Still, nothing else could have been done under the circumstances, and whatever happened there was satisfaction in knowing this.

"Pete, get your gun," he said sternly.

If there was to be any lead throwing in those dizzy heights the boy of color should do their share of it.

But Pete was apparently slow to obey, for he realized the gravity of the occasion.

Taking the Marin repeating rifle he stood in plain view of developments.

This left Bob free to manage the balloon.

When the other aerialist had mounted to a height equal to that which they had reversed, those in control prevented its rising further.

It was in their rear, though the breeze was now so high that they had not drifted beyond gunshot.

"Be ready, Pete. If you see or hear them fire, blaze away. It rests with them whether there is to be a tragedy in midair."

"They're looking at us with a glass."

Bob snatched up a field glass.

"Yes," he declared, "and one of them has a gun in his hands."

"The fiends."

"Level your rifle, Pete, but hold your fire until I give the word."

Pete did so.

The effect was marvelous as Bob discovered by means of his glass.

It was Signor Chiraldi who handled the gun, and he made great haste to put it away.

Evidently, much as he longed to destroy the Sky Wanderer, when it came about that the boot was on the other leg, and their craft in danger of being demolished, the case was quite different.

The sun peeped up and bathed both balloons in its mellow light.

With its rising came the wind, increasing in force.

It was grand.

They could see a great panorama spread out below, in which towns and cities were dotted, rivers took the likeness of silver, and the whole country was a flat map.

A few drifting clouds sometimes overspread them but as yet the region above was fairly clear.

The professor was a man of long experience, and it might easily be determined that he knew all the small wrinkles calculated to assist the speed of such a vessel.

Besides, in making his new balloon he doubtless took advantage of the opportunity to improve on the old model.

Therefore the gas burning gained, and if it was to be a race there was evidence in this that the Sky Dancer was not in it, unless Bob could find some means of increasing his speed, which was hardly likely.

He threw out some ballast.

They mounted high above the clouds and were spinning along at a giddy speed.

At any rate the Italian would be given a run for his money.

Not being to the manner born, the signor would feel that peculiar sense of alarm that comes over one who for the first time in his life finds the sands of time running.

Therefore the professor went and at the increased height they went sailing on.

Even the thought of falling was enough to make that person in a man's veins, for they were possibly some two miles above the earth's surface.

Heaven help the wretch who once started to make that journey.

They would find a pancake instead of a man.

It was Bob's policy to keep Barbara hidden for the present.

Possibly the enemies did not even suspect her presence in midair.

Hence he bade her to crawl under one of the blankets, which the child was not loth to do, for by this time she had become very keen, and both boys were forced to button up their coats.

As the other balloon continued to gain upon them, in half an hour it was within speaking distance.

It is almost incredible, the speed with which these airships can travel when a good breeze.

They do not have to resist the principle of friction as compared to the swift passage of a railroad train, and even the resistance of the atmosphere, as the onward progress of steamships or sailing vessels does not arise in this case.

Only a spot marked upon the map of the earth as the scene of their ascent was long since left behind, and they were in a speeding along in a noiseless, fascinating manner, which experience alone can serve to be understood.

At length Bob and two air monsters were not separated by more than a hundred feet.

Pete still stood there holding his rifle.

"Do they mean to board us?" he demanded.

"Hardly," laughed Bob, "for such a thing would be impossible. With such immense globes above, the baskets could never come together. If they did, the moment any men jumped, their balloon would shoot up.

"And ours drop like a stone."

"Yes."

"But what can they want?"

"Probably to talk. It would be a novelty to meet on a conversation two miles in the air."

"Watch him."

The Italian had put his hands to his mouth, forming a rude trumpet.

"What do you want?" he called.

"I don't hear you."

"I know we've got the girl," said Pete quickly.

"Surrender—what?" demanded his comrade.

"You have my child," came the response.

"We refuse to give her up."

That is enough. You will all perish miserably together."

CHAPTER VIII.
PARACHUTE PETE TAKES A TUMBLE.

These vindictive words only served to render the young aeronauts more determined.

They knew their ground.

This man had no grain of affection for Barbara, whom he called his child, and they did not believe that ties of relationship bound them, else he could not so coolly threaten her death.

"We laugh at your threats. If you try to destroy us we have you at our mercy. Perhaps you may not mind a fall of two miles. At any rate you'd never know what hurt you."

Bob was quite at his ease, a circumstance the others could not fail to note.

The Italian raved.

"Keep off," said Pete, bringing his rifle to bear upon the two men, for the pursuing craft was drawing up too close on them.

The professor dropped to a little lower level and the two balloons kept on in company for a long time.

It must have been an astonishing spectacle that any one below whose keen vision discovered these two airships traveling the mysterious regions above the clouds.

These latter had increased in number and there were indications of a storm.

Bob had dropped down when the other balloon did, for the latter was now in sight.

He hoped the professor might be unable to check the progress of his craft, and that leave them further in the lurch.

This, however, did not happen.

Bob knew how to put out a wind drag and thus delay his onward sweep.

It was impossible to be rid of him.

Thus noon came.

It found them rushing onward.

The wind had carried them far to the south, and through breaches in the clouds north, and through breaches in the clouds could be seen the waters of a great body of water.

Could it be possible they had already drifted over the great lakes at the junction of Michigan and Huron?

A fall now would be just as fatal as on the land—indeed, the unfortunate would-be victims be dead before he reached the water.

Pete's wee nose treated to a sight that was rather novel, though common enough with old and experienced sky farers.

A thunder storm was sweeping over the lakes.

Below them were black masses of clouds.

The lightning leaped from one to another, and the peal of thunder were deafening, although a battle royal was taking place.

Both of the boys were entranced with the view, and even Barbara recovering from her first fright, was induced to bend over the edge of the basket to look upon the weird spectacle.

How it happened no one was ever able to say.

Bob turned his attention to another quarter, and suddenly his ears were saluted by a shriek from Barbara.

He turned to find that Parachute Pete was no longer in the basket of the balloon.

Leaning over, some sudden whirl must have sent him out.

It was with a feeling of horror that Bob beheld the negro boy falling.

He fully expected to see his unfortunate companion dropped like a plummet into the storm clouds far below, through whose he would shoot like a meteor to meet his fate in the lakes.

Not so.

Pete was indeed kind to poor Pete.

Even as he fell to what seemed certain death, he suddenly threw up both hands.

A couple of ropes trailed below.

They were useful to stay the progress of the balloon, for as they slithered along the earth, men racing after could catch hold of these ropes.

His hand clasped one and closed upon it with the grim clutch of despair.

As Bob's horror-stricken face appeared over the edge of the basket, there was his [illegible] ing on feet or more below.

His face was white, but he seemed to retain some of his nerve, and in a rather [illegible] voice called out:

"Still on deck, old fellow."

"Can you climb up?" demanded Bob.

"Yes, but can't get over the edge."

"Can you hold on?"

"If the rope don't break, sure."

Hand over hand he climbed up a bit, until he could get his feet on the rope.

"I have a plan. There is the cabin [illegible] make a noose in the end and drop down to me."

"That's a good fellow, Bob."

Suddenly the boy gave up his situation as a tail to the big kite.

He was a little nervous about the rope, for a sudden jerk might snap it, and as well, there was consolation in the fact that no pain would accompany his taking off.

Bob was soon ready.

He paid the rope out over the side.

The loop came within Pete's grasp and he laid hold of it.

To transfer his allegiance to the new line was but the work of a second.

Then he felt safer.

"Hold fast above," he shouted, beginning to climb.

To an athlete this was not a stupendous task, especially since he now had support.

Reaching the basket he was quickly by Bob's outstretched hand and assisted in.

Some one applauded.

It was the professor.

He had seen some [illegible] during a lifetime de[illegible] regions of the clouds, [illegible] new for thrilling features exhibited in getting for the [illegible] were extended [illegible] tion to give it.

Poor Pete was quite exhausted, [illegible] gained the interior of [illegible]

In spite of the chilly state of the atmosphere, great beads of perspiration stood out upon his forehead, and he breathed heavily.

Nevertheless, his first act was to pick up the gun he had dropped when taking his headlong plunge, and resume his watch over the rival balloon.

It had been a terrible experience, and one Pete was not apt to forget in a hurry.

The storm still thundered and flashed below as it appeared to be driving in something of the same direction as themselves.

"What are they doing?" asked Pete suddenly.

"Throwing out ballast," returned Bob.

"They mount higher."

"Shall we follow suit?"

"I don't see the necessity. Only for the storm I'd rather drop lower."

As yet neither of them suspected the intentions of their enemies, who sought to destroy them, but there was a deep motive in this new action, which would soon be discovered.

The rival balloon arose until it soared far up in the realms above.

Pete laid his gun aside as it was useless now.

Did the others mean to give up the fight?

They moved faster and were gradually reaching a point directly overhead.

"Good Heavens! see there, they are dropping balls of fire down on us!" exclaimed Pete.

What he said was the truth—the scoundrels in the other balloon were firing balls of cotton soaked in oil and attached to weights.

One of these strange messengers sped by

"Level your rifle, but hit your fir close to them—others were following fast.

Should one alight on the balloon there would be a quick explosion, and then—annihilation!

It was a fearful moment.

Would Bob be equal to the occasion?

CHAPTER IX.
STORM-TOSSED.

Nothing could be gained by delay.

The other balloon was so far above them that it was next to impossible for them to see it and utterly out of the question to dream of hitting it with the rifle.

Hence, their enemies, having outgenerated them in a choice of position, were now in a way to do them incalculable damage.

True, they could also ascend.

All that was necessary was to throw out some of the sandbags constituting the ballast.

What would that avail?

As they arose the danger must increase, since they were almost directly under the others.

If the fire balls failed in their mission, perhaps a bomb, judiciously dropped might cause a fracture in the silken globe and bring about the sudden end.

Besides, there was the gun that could certainly be brought to bear upon the balloon.

To ascend looked like inviting death. But letting a little gas escape and [illegible] down?

[illegible] pect was not very inviting.

[illegible] did not catch a glimpse of the [illegible] because of the whirling [illegible] continued to mass below.

[illegible] ing clouds kept up their furious [illegible] and there was anything [illegible] nothing had to be done, since they [illegible] they were.

Another fire ball came down and alighted on the balloon.

The young aeronauts held their breath, fearful lest the end had come. There would be no time given to prepare with parachutes or anything else—besides, with a raging storm underneath and the mighty lake below that, of what avail would such weak measures be?

The fire ball failed to remain upon the top of the balloon, but drifted by, sputtering wickedly.

It was a narrow escape.

Bob hesitated no longer, realizing the value of time in an emergency like this.

He opened the valve and allowed some of the gas to escape.

Immediately they began to fall rapidly, and approach the storm clouds.

A new experience was about to be their portion. For while they escaped the dreadful danger threatening them from human agency above, it was to encounter other perils in one way just as terrible.

Suddenly the sunlight was shut out—they had entered among the clouds.

Pete was ready for this moment.

Over went a sandbag, and their progress was stayed—another, and they no longer descended, but were rushed along with the eddies of wind that swept the fog-like banks like the waters in a furious rapids, whirling, rushing and struggling in maddening fury.

It was a sensation to awe one, while at the same time it aroused the liveliest anticipations. Under ordinary conditions when danger threatens a determined man may generally help himself, and very often turn the scale in his favor.

But the vivid flashes of lightning when the electric fluid darted from cloud to cloud, lit up the scene with a ghastly glare.

Thus Bob's face looked unnaturally white to his companion when he saw it.

There was a firm expression about it, too, a clinching of the teeth that told of a stubborn will fairly aroused.

He would only give in when compelled to.

"What do you think of it?" gasped Pete, anxious to know the worst, for his nerves were all on edge, so to speak.

"It's a cyclone of the clouds," came the reply.

"And growing worse all the time?"

"I fear so."

"Then we're goners."

"That doesn't follow. At the last when I make a motion with my arm——"

"Yes."

"Heave over a couple of sandbags and we'll climb out of this again."

"Phew!" as the lightning flashed around them, and the thunder crashed with a power that made the balloon itself find it hard to equal, "I hope it will be soon, then."

"Not getting frightened, Pete, I hope?"

"Oh, no, but just a little anxious, you know."

They said no more, for with such a clatter and din around them, it was very difficult to converse.

Pete was encouraged by the determined air of his companion.

In such a time of turmoil, a brave presence carries with it great weight.

There could be no mistaking the fact that their situation was growing worse instead of better.

The indications seemed to point to the fact that they were being hurried forward to what might be the core or center of the disturbance, and in a celestial storm, this is the position that entails the most danger.

It was worse than being in a storm at sea.

There, a staunch ship stood between the wind-tossed mariners and death.

Even should the worst overtake them and a wreck occur, they still had a chance for saving their lives.

Life boats, patent rafts, wreckage, all these things offered at least an opportunity.

How different with voyagers in a balloon.

The snapping of even one rope might cause the great airship to careen, and once a wreck occurred nothing could save the travelers.

Bob knew it, too.

He was only keeping along in the clouds as long as he dared, hoping to distance the other balloon and avoid being bombarded again.

There were almost continual noises in the air, but when by accident now and then these ceased, they could hear poor Barbara praying or sobbing.

The darkness increased, so that between the flashes of lightning it was as though night had descended upon them.

As it was only between two and three in the afternoon, this was all the more terrifying.

There was always great danger lest some stray bolt of electricity, in its gambols from one cloud to another, might take an erratic course and cause the explosion of the gas in the silk bag.

Of course the combustion would hardly cause a murmur in comparison with the tremendous rattle of Heaven's artillery, but it would be the crack of doom to the three venturesome wanderers who braved the perils of the upper currents of air.

When the wind gave them such a shake that the basket seemed on the verge of being wholly overturned, and the balloon began to turn around with the twisting motion that marks the funnel of a tornado on the prairies, Bob Reason knew the time had come to make a change.

It was now or never.

He might again encounter new dangers above, but it was folly to remain longer here.

Turning to Pete he found that worthy watching him with the eyes of a hawk.

All that was needed was a gesture.

Pete had prepared himself.

Over went a sandbag.

The balloon instantly felt the effect—there was an additional buoyancy in the way the great airship cleft the atmosphere, a spring to their progress, which had been utterly lacking while they were battered about at the mercy of the conflicting winds.

Again Bob moved his arm.

Pete had stooped and had another sandbag in his arms, which he heaved over as though he were an automaton.

Again their upward movement received a new impetus.

At this rate they must soon rush out of the swirling clouds into the still clear atmosphere that lay above.

Both boys were dizzy on account of the circular, whirling movement which the balloon had taken.

It is one of the most disagreeable experiences of such a venture and which remains as a nightmare [illegible] the mental discomforts arising from the sensation have vanished.

Even a third sandbag was sent flying into space, and then Bob signaled "enough."

Already was the darkness lessening as they mounted nearer the upper strata of clouds and the sunshine found a chance to penetrate.

It was a cheering sign.

Even Petite Barbara, conscious that a change was taking place, came out from under the shelter of the blanket, and creeping to the edge of the basket, peered over at the sights with awe written upon every feature of her face.

Thus they finally shot out from among the last straggling bits of vapors—the storm raged and roared below—above were the blue heavens, with the great golden orb half-way down toward the western horizon.

It was like a sudden translation from darkness to light, from death to life!

This extremely interesting story of youthful adventuren in ballooning will be continued in next week's Ledger. This story is filled with excitement and dangerous situations, and if you do not read it to the end you will miss a great deal that is splendidly entertaining. Would you like our fine King Cameras without cost, or any of our fine spring patterns entirely free? Then subscribe for the Ledger and they will be sent to you. Read our premium announcement on pages thirteen and fifteen.

In the Courtroom.

First Lawyer—Whenever Attorney Weepson addresses the jury he becomes so impassioned that he weeps.

Second Lawyer—They ought to call him "the court crier."

$5.25
20 Year Guarantee
THE ENGINE SPECIAL
A 23 JEWELED ADJUSTED WATCH
BEING IS BELIEVING. On this and send it to us with your name and address and express charges and we will send the watch to you for examination. You examine it at your express office & if as represented and you are satisfied pay the agent our special price $5.25 and express charges and it is yours.
W. C. CHALMERS & CO., 855 Dearborn St., Chicago.

CAMERA AND PHOTO OUTFIT
FREE

FREE
With One Year's Subscription to
THE CHICAGO LEDGER
This is the King Camera. Any person can take excellent pictures with it by following the instructions. You can finish your own pictures with the complete outfit we send with the Camera.
The Printing and Developing Outfit consists of one package "Perfect" Dry Plates, one Tray for developing, one Tray for toning pictures, one package Developer, one package Toning Chemicals, one package Hypo, one Printing Back, one package Sensitized Printing Paper and one package Ruby Paper. Everything you need.
To Secure Camera and Outfit Free send $1.00 for one year's subscription to The Chicago Ledger. You get this fine paper every week for a year for the dollar, and you get the Camera and Outfit absolutely free, if you subscribe now.
(Canadian subscription price $1.50 per year.)
Send to
W. D. BOYCE CO., BOYCE BUILDING, CHICAGO.

Take Your Pants Off

We will give you a new Pair worth $5 FREE Also a FANCY VEST and SUIT CASE with your first Order for one of our $10 SUITS.

We will make to your measure from the finest fabrics in the latest styles and finished equal to the BEST $20 CLOTHING

$10.00

If a suit made by us is not satisfactory in fit, color or any way different from what you expected, you may keep the Suit besides we will give you your money back

We have customers in every town and city in the United States

FREE REMEMBER

$5 extra pair of fine Worsted stripe $5.00 Trousers sent C. O. D. Over-draw privilege, if desired.

Send us your name and address and we will send you by mail, free of charge, our handsome Fall and Winter Style Book containing over 100 fine illustrations of the latest styles for Men and Boys, also Measurement Blanks, Rules for self-measurement, Tape Measure, Samples of Cloth, etc., all FREE, with your First Order.

Write to-day for our Free Style Book and Samples.

THE STEIN-AUBURN TAILORING CO.

619 Exner Bldg., 5th Ave. & Congress, Chicago

Reference: Royal Trust Bank, Chicago, or any Chicago Commercial Agency.

TAPE-WORM EXPELLED WITH HEAD, GUARANTEED. Booklet free. Dr. Bessonies, 1164 Broadway, N. Y.

Franklin Needles, Rods, Goldenrotters for all Foreign Coins. Buy and Sell by Express. Your inducements are the best. Call 2 cents. Have Supply in Stock. Write for Prices.

OPIUM and Liquor Habit cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till cured. DR. J. C. HOFFMAN, Dept. H. S. Lebanon, Ohio.

DETECTIVES Earn $25 to $100 a week in your community, or we will show you. Previous experience unnecessary. Send for free book of particulars. GEORGE WAGNER, Detective, Cincinnati, Ohio.

FITS CURED When I say cured, I mean cured. I do not mean to stop the disease of Fits, Epilepsy or Falling Sickness for a time and then have them return again. I MEAN A RADICAL CURE. I have made the disease of Fits, Epilepsy or Falling Sickness a lifelong study and I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not sending to me for a treatment. I have a cure for you. Send at once for a treatise and a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. Give Express and Postoffice address. DR. H. G. ROOT, M. C., 183 Pearl St., New York.

"PERSONAL"

Any lady or gentleman wishing to correspond with the opposite sex for fun, pleasure, friendship or matrimony, should write us. Strictly confidential; no names published; no exposure. We introduce by mail. Many thousand acquaintances and many friends are arranged through us. Everything strictly confidential. We refer to this paper. Standard Correspondence Club, publishers of the only and membership blanks. Love Tea 40c.
Standard Correspondence Club, Chicago, Ill.

MEN AND WOMEN

CURE YOURSELF! Dr. Kay's wonderful remedy for Gonorrhoea, Gleet, Spermatorrhoea, Whites, unnatural discharges, or any inflammation, irritation or ulceration of mucous membranes. Non-astringent and SOLD BY DRUGGISTS or sent to plain wrapper, by express, prepaid, for $1.00, or 3 bottles, $2.75. Circular sent on request.

WETO GRAPH

LEAD PENCIL DUPLICATOR. NO STENCIL NO INK. NO MESS.

FOR LOVERS AND HEIRS

Every time and every year writers believe untold love or fortune is lost, or is suspected to be, through failure to write letters. Whether you are a Weto Graph user or not, for romance reasons, secret reasons, business, address, or information you do not want anyone to find out. You can write to your friends as usual and no one can find out what you have written. Tale of Tea to have a Weto Graph. Don't miss it. Send for free booklet at once. The Weto Graph is by mail, with full instructions, for $2.00.
PENN PUBLISHING CO., PARKESBURG, Pa.

BLOOD POISON

FOR MORE THAN TWENTY YEARS we have made the cure of blood poison a specialty. Primary, Secondary or Tertiary Blood Poisons Permanently Cured. You can be treated at home under same guaranty. Capital $500,000. We solicit the most obstinate cases. If you have exhausted the old methods of treatment, and still have aches and pains, Mucous Patches in Mouth, Sore Throat, Pimples, Copper-Colored Blotches, Ulcers on any part of the body, Hair or Eyebrows falling out, write for proof of cures. 90-page book free.
COOK REMEDY CO., 1709 MASONIC TEMPLE, Chicago, U. S. A.

Free Sample
COPY
of COMMERCIAL POULTRY, a journal devoted to the culture of poultry. Issued monthly. Every number contains valuable information for poultrymen. Its articles are prepared by men who have made a success of raising poultry. They tell the reader, in these articles, how to produce the best results with the smallest expenditure. Don't take our word for this. Send for a sample copy and see for yourself.
Write to COMMERCIAL POULTRY CO.
Dept. 23, Marseilles, Ill.

When answering advertisements you will oblige the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

Two Faces Under One Hat.

(Continued from page seven.)

panied by Kate drove from the sheriff's door.

Now be it remembered that Marsh was one of the sheriff's bondsmen, and to him he had made known his desire to make Kate his wife. Whereupon the sheriff had told his wife, and if ever a human being was extolled, and all the good qualities and imaginary good qualities that he possessed, or might have possessed, heralded to mortal ears, that one was Caleb Marsh on this occasion of Kate's visit, and by the two would-be gatekeepers, who in their hearts despised Marsh, as did nearly every one else in the county.

But he was Sheriff Root's bondsman, and even if the sheriff did have to pay his State and county taxes, it was a service, and being such, he thought it no more than his duty to help him along in this matter of securing a young and handsome wife. "If she don't have a good time at first," he said to his wife, "I will take her to Delevelope back. I really could not think of accepting it. What about you?"

"Because I love you, Miss Kate! You know I love you with all my heart, and that is the reason I ask you to be my wife. There is nothing I would not do to make you happy."

Kate's face at first turned scarlet, then became as white as marble, and she evidently taken ill, and she trembled with agitation.

"I have loved you for a long time," continued Caleb, "and I have tried to prove it to you by every good to you and your father, have I not?"

"Yes, yes, sir; very good. No one would have taken pains like you."

"Well, Kate, I want you for my wife. As long as I have a home, and being in the carrying Mark, I tried to give up with a good grace, but I couldn't, because innocent, for your sake; but he didn't, and you will never see him again. If you should, you will be ignored by your wife. Everything will show you that you should become my wife."

"Your father would be happy in our marriage, for his mortgages, as your husband I would release. It would make the poor man alive. Sarah would worship you as though you were a goddess, for the love and money of Caleb Marsh could make you happy you should not know an unhappy hour. I have waited a long time, Kate, to give you time to think and to know me better. Now I must know, will you become my wife?"

"I feared this, Mr. Marsh. I feared it, and cannot claim that I am surprised."

"Feared it, Miss Kate?" said Caleb, with a troubled look.

"I feel very grateful to you, Mr. Marsh, for all you have done for me," said Kate, with tears in her eyes, "and I should. But for your kindness we would be out of our home; but gratitude, I think, is not love. I do not love you as a wife should love her husband."

"Bless you, Miss Kate, it is hardly to be supposed you love me at first; but wait, once you are my wife, I shall be so good to you, you can't help it, and every wish shall be gratified. Your father's wants shall all be attended to, and our home shall be a paradise, and no one can find out what you have written. Lots of fun to have a Weto Graph. Don't miss it. Send for booklet at once. The Weto Graph is by mail, with full instructions, for $2.00. PENN PUBLISHING CO., PARKESBURG, Pa.

"Now, Kate, sweet girl, then you are mine! Mine!" cried Caleb, as exultingly as any lover ever did.

"Not yet, Mr. Marsh! Arthur may return and pay off your mortgages before the time expires."

"Ah, true!" he said, with a peculiar smile, "and then I lose you."

"Unless I change my mind. I don't think I love you well enough to become your wife."

"Well enough? Then you do love me some?"

"I have not said so."

"Well, I must be content. If I know that you will not become Arthur's wife, I can come until after that date; though I would he could be present at our wedding. But mine shall not take place very much cold weather runs them out. You are my promised bride, and knowing that you are, I shall make you happy, I am content."

"Conditionally—my promised bride," said Kate, as she glanced at him. "Oh!" she exclaimed, and a sudden tremor seized her frame.

They were passing the spot where the murder had been committed.

"I often feel like that, Miss Kate," Caleb said, "when driving by the spot where that poor devil, Kate Wilson, was killed by Prince!" and the speed of the horse was increased.

"Strange," said Kate presently, "that I should have promised, even conditionally, to become your bride, when that horrible murder was committed."

"You have promised," said he, "and we were approaching it, Kate. Imagine your words recalled. Imagine him not here, but left behind, will you become my wife on the 15th of September?"

"Conditionally," said Kate, and she reiterated the conditions.

"Then here is the final ring tomorrow," he said. "A sparkling diamond will look well on your finger, Kate."

Caleb thought of claiming a kiss; but he knew he should only cause his companion to withdraw from him in disgust.

"I hardly think, being engaged only conditionally, I would wear the ring," said Kate.

"I shall procure it, and I trust, Kate, to please me you will wear it. It will not prove burdensome, and I would almost command you to wear it now. Virtually, you know, your conditions amount to nothing."

"Tell me, then, that you do not hate your future husband."

"Your future husband." The words evidently gave him pain.

"If I hated you, Mr. Marsh, I should not have given you the promise, even conditionally. I think more of you than I once imagined I ever could."

"Sweet girl, you shall never think less of me," he said. "I will risk that you will love me when I am your husband. When the time draws near I shall supply you with money, Kate, to purchase your bridal outfit."

"My tastes are not extravagant," said Kate, and when the time comes, I can procure what I shall require."

"Then I shall not be my wife, and to help spend my money. The handsomest girl in the county shall be the best dressed bride. No gossiping tongues shall say that Caleb Marsh loves his money better than his bride of his choice at the altar."

"If I am your wife, I shall try to please you."

"Bless you, you have only to please yourself to please me. If I can make you happy, it is all I ask."

"Who would have believed that Caleb Marsh could be so contident in his success?" thought Kate, as she said:

"You love me?"

"Kind, sweet girl? I love you," was the reply. "You are my life, Kate. You will try to forget that you ever named conditions for they will prove no bar to our marriage. The 15th of September, I will be husband and wife."

"Husband and wife!" echoed Kate, as the horse drew up at Elwood's.

The thrilling and remarkable story will be continued in next week's Ledger, giving the reader chapters filled with dramatic and interesting incidents. Don't fail to every one subscribing for the Ledger we have now pending, entirely without cost, one of our splendid Ring Cameras, also any six of our selected and valuable patterns, as illustrated in another column and dated. Look at our advertisement of these splendid premiums and see if you do not wish them.

Every Lady Read This.

Years ago when I was a sufferer, an old nurse told me of a simple home remedy which quickly overcame Female Weakness, Uterine and Ovarian troubles. It cured me in one month. It is a simple herb tea. Women should use it to prevent by any one having the recipe. I will send it free to every suffering sister who writes for it. Address Mrs. A. Hedrick South Bend, Indiana.

Tillman Talking.

Senator Tillman was recently talking in his outspoken manner. The conversation threatened to be stormy. A friend expostulated.

"Please don't talk so much," said the warning voice.

"Talk!" he shouted. "I'll talk just as much, wherever and whenever I please. I would like to see the man who can keep me from talking!"

"I can!" came a voice from the crowd.

Tillman turned and glared. Then his eye caught the speaker. He pretended to quail. The laugh went around and the critical situation was saved.

The man who had hurled the defiant "I can!" was Dr. T. T. Moore, Tillman's lifetime dentist.

Science Notes.

English factory girls are not in all cases ready to accept scientific improvements in their working quarters. They actually have been known to show an aversion to well-ventilated rooms, preferring their old, stuffy quarters. Professor Kenwood of University College, London, recently lectured to a number of such young women, taking for a text the "germ" theory and saying: "The contents of this tube I hold show you the color of arterial blood. Before it has circulated through the body and gathered up its impurities." There was a suppressed murmur of astonishment as the girls gazed at the tube with its bright, blood-red contents. "Now in this tube," said the lecturer ominously, as he held up another vessel, "you see what represents the condition of the blood after it has passed through the body." A prolonged and horror-stricken "Oo-oh!" greeted this exhibit. The tube seemed to be full of dirty red ink, and the professor took advantage of the impression he had made to lay down the principle: "We fresh air, no night-rail fads." Next he drove the lesson deeper in by reminding the girls that Grace Darling had died of consumption at the age of 37, and because she slept in a chamber little bigger than herself. The glorious freedom of the Farne islands availed her nothing, although she breathed it all day. She slept in a badly ventilated room.

How large is an atom? Lord Kelvin says that if a drop of water were to be the size of the earth and raise the atom in the same proportion, then it will be some place between the size of a marble and a cricket ball," John A. Brashear in an address delivered before the Liverpool Gas Co. says added: "If you fill a tiny vessel one centimeter cube (somewhat less than a thimble) with hydrogen corpuscles, you can place therein, in round numbers, five hundred and twenty-five billion billion (525,000,000,000,000,000,000,000) of them. If these corpuscles are allowed to escape at the velocity at the rate of 1,000 per second it will require seventeen quintillions (17,000,000,000,000,000,000) of years to empty it."

How long can an animal live without breathing? A dog was kept underground for twenty-nine days in a rabbit warren at Mont St. Rorme recently, but came out alive. During the siege of Metz, in the Franco-Prussian war, a dog was confined without food or drink for twenty-three days; while Dover records have the story of a pig which lived at sea for a week, and came out all right at the end of 150 days.

A Warning to the Public.

"What is the charge against this man?" asked the judge as a man whose appearance left no doubt as to the line of economy people faced him.

"He is charged with disorderly and unbecoming entertainment," replied the policeman who had made the arrest.

"What is the complaint?" the judge asked.

A meek and humble millionaire, who had made a fortune in the bread and milk trust, stepped forward.

"I am, your honor," he said.

"Go ahead and tell in your own way what you have against the defendant," said the judge.

"Yesterday afternoon, your honor, while I was engaged in acting as one of the pallbearers for a fellow chatfeur, who was killed in a race in one of the downtown streets my wife and daughter asked me to take a spin on the boulevard. I lifted him into my private automobile.

"How old is little Algernon?" the judge asked.

"Algernon is not quite 3 years old, your honor, and as quiet and peaceable a little fellow as you would wish to meet. As I said, I lifted Algernon into the car, and he left me with his hat. But within half an hour he returned in tears. Yet first he refused to tell what was the trouble. After considerable questioning I learned a man had crossed the street in front of the machine, and I had to stop to check his machine, but to deviate from the course I had selected. Little fellow said he would not have cared so much if he had not been making a speed test. The action of the man caused Algernon to lose at least a second and a half.

"I don't see why I should be fined severely punished, Judge; but surely something should be done to teach pedestrians their place and I am merely asking that my son should be a victim of this person's deliberate disregard for the law. You have a little boy, Judge, and if you have you will understand my position.

"I have two boys, and I know exactly how you feel," said the Judge. "And though your wife and daughter may be not punished too severely is a most creditable one, showing as it does a kind heart and of a forgiving nature, I cannot pay any attention to it in passing sentence. The time has come when the rights of millionaires must be protected by the courts and observed by the people—not only the rights of millionaires, but the rights of their children. The defendant is therefore fined a fine of $5,000. And may this case be a warning to the public!"

Give and Take.

"Rockefeller must be a great believer in reciprocity."

"Why so?"

"Why, whenever he gives away a million or so he advances the price of oil."

BE EVERY INCH A MAN

Our new SCIENTIFIC APPLIANCE explosive Nature's own method of DEVELOPING and STRENGTHENING [illegible] and restoring them to full VIGOR POWER by increasing the supply [illegible] where most needed. No drugs or [illegible] quired. Thousands have used [illegible] with most marvelous results. Why [illegible] and be convinced that we have [illegible] only method of cure which is not [illegible] and most beneficial? Write [illegible] sealed, FREE, our illustrated [illegible] explaining this wonderful discovery.

CRARY VACUUM
900 Dexter Building, Ch[illegible]

AN EVERYDAY MIRACLE.

BY S. E. KISER.

He scoffed at the Christian's hope and he sneered at the poet's song;
He passed the beautiful by and noticed only the wrong.
All things under the sky—mountain and plain and sea—
Were planted by a bungling hand, he said in his mockery.

The lay of the lark to him was only a dismal screech;
Wealth was the only heaven, he thought, that a man could reach.
He turned from the murmuring brook, wearying the hopeless frown,
And hid in a dismal nook in the heart of the dismal town.

On a day when the clouds were dark and the world was cold and wet,
She passed where he paused a while, and his turned and their glances met;
She smiled on him, and he smiled on, humming a glad, sweet air,
And he saw that the clouds were gone, that beauty was everywhere.

He that had scoffed at those who hoped for Learned, being taught by her, that God was a God of love;
Mountain and plain and sea, all had become sublime
Ere the moment that he and she met for the second time.

HELPED BY A CLOUDBURST

BY NORMAN THELOS.

"I don't care about the bridge so much," explained Dustan Carmichael, impatiently. "That is annoying and expensive and all that, but somehow I must get those papers to New York in time for the meeting it will cost me pretty nearly to $2,000,000. I'll give $10,000 to any man who will cross the stream."

"I wouldn't do it for the whole $2,000,000," said Cassidy, the foreman, decidedly. "Maybe some of the boys would try. I'll ask 'em."

Dick Breslin looked at the raging flood. During the night there had been a cloudburst up in the mountains. The ordinarily shallow stream was swollen to a width of 200 feet and the temporary railroad bridge had been swept away.

Carmichael was practically marooned in his private car on the further bank and the current was so full of debris that none dared attempt the passage.

The rain still fell in torrents and added to the discomfort of the situation. Carmichael, president of the uncompleted Gold Gulch Railway, stormed up and down the bank.

Cassidy, the section foreman, had reported that none would attempt to cross, yet the railroad must be ready by 4 o'clock to catch the Overland. The main line was safe and a messenger could get to New York in plenty of time.

Gillis, his private secretary, paced the opposite bank. He had been down to the junction and was just back.

Breslin shared his employer's nervousness and accompanied him in his restless pacing until, from the private car, there stepped a hooded figure.

"Is it still bad?" asked the girl as he approached.

"Worse, Claire. I don't think the water will fall before tomorrow."

"And no one will try for the reward?"

"No one seems anxious to try for a suicide's grave," he laughed. "That's about what it would mean."

"Will you go halves with me?" she demanded suddenly.

"Die together?"

Claire shook her head.

"Father said we could get married when you had earned $5,000. It will take you two years with this construction gang to earn that much. We can hurry it along."

"In with you," he cried. "What is the idea?"

"Let's arrange with dad first." They went toward the bank. Mr. Carmichael paused to greet his daughter.

"You had better go back to the car," he said. "This weather is not made for young women."

"It won't hurt me," she said. "I've a proposition to make, dad."

"And that is?"

"You told Dick that we could get married when he had earned $5,000. Then you put him with this construction gang, and it will take two years for him to earn it at the salary you pay him."

"And you've just discovered that if I pay him more the time will be shorter? This is a bad time for discoveries."

Claire shook her head.

"Will you give us that reward if we get the papers across for you? Dick and I are partners. We'll each take half."

"You ought to help me out, anyhow," he declared.

"I won't," she said, "and Dick doesn't know how."

Her dimpled chin squared itself determinedly. Mr. Carmichael knew what that meant. She inherited his stubbornness, and he surrendered unconditionally.

She drew Breslin aside and whispered for a moment. Then she went back to their private car, while he headed in the direction of the locomotive.

Some whisper of an attempt to bridge the stream was passed about and both banks were lined with workmen as Breslin returned.

"Going to shoot the box across?" demanded Cassidy, as he noticed that Dick carried a gun.

"Something like that," he admitted, as he proceeded to grease the outside of the gun

[illegible] him in surprise. But his [illegible] nothing to his amusement when [illegible] to drive stakes into the clay [illegible] about it. Then [illegible] a section of pipe [illegible] with nails and fastened [illegible] to it.

[illegible] to watch [illegible] Breslin on the gun and rested [illegible] stick. [illegible] was a report, the line whizzed out over the stakes, but the projectile fell short.

"I'll get it yet," he cried, as he drew another cartridge from his pocket. "I didn't want to send it so far that the cord would give out."

Slowly he drew back the line. It was not an easy matter, for the floating trees threatened several times to break the line. It was a quarter of an hour before the projectile was back on land and Dick was untying it with his handkerchief.

This done there was a heavier report, the black projectile rose in a curve and fell on the opposite bank. There Gillis caught it and raised the line out of the water.

From the telegraph kit, they obtained some light, strong rope and this in turn was drawn across. Then a water-tight box containing the papers and a letter of instruction to Gillis was fastened to the line and hauled across. Ten minutes later the puffs of smoke announced the departure of an engine for the junction.

Carmichael watched the smoke until it faded into the distance, then he turned away with a sigh of satisfaction.

"Let's go up to lunch," he said. "I haven't had any breakfast yet, and I'm hungry. Come along, Dick. I want to talk with you."

After the chill of the morning the car seemed gratefully warm and Carmichael grew genial.

"Whose scheme was that?" he demanded. "Dick's," said Claire promptly.

"It was Claire's," corrected Breslin. "I don't want any credit that is not due me. She remembered a rifle gun we saw in town when we went to a fire house. It's like the life-line mortar, only you can't drop the line in the barrel. It was an easy thing to find a piece of pipe to fit the muzzle of the rifle. It was the idea that was worth while."

Carmichael smiled indulgently. "At any rate," he said, "you did your share and you did it well. When I made work a condition of my consent to your marriage I only wanted to make sure that there was good stuff in you. Claire made you her partner because she wanted you. Now I'll make you two my partners. You saved me a lot of money. None of that will go into the finest house you want. I'll let Claire pick it out."

"I have all the money I need," objected Breslin.

"I know that, my boy," smiled the older man. "But I want the house as a souvenir that I've got a clever daughter and as clever a son-in-law. Here's to you both," and he raised his glass.

"And here's to the cloudburst—and the opportunity," finished Claire.

Spooner's Shooting.

Senator Spooner of Wisconsin is a successful hunter of big game. On one of his trips he had for his guide Bill Murray. They were out looking for bear. Over one day, when Murray suddenly threw up his rifle and fired. The Senator saw an animal fall heavily, and called: "We've got him this time, Bill."

"We!" sneered the guide. "There's no we about it. I killed him plain enough."

Quickly making their way to where their quarry lay, they found a fine specimen of jersey calf.

"We've killed somebody's calf!" yelled the guide.

Senator Spooner gave him a withering look and said: "William, you should be more particular in your choice of pronouns. We isn't adapted to this particular instance."

FREE---6 STYLISH PATTERNS---FREE

We will send any six of these fashionable, up-to-date patterns ABSOLUTELY FREE with one year's subscription to THE CHICAGO LEDGER. These patterns are from the latest Paris designs. They are best for the home dress, making, being simple and economical.

One year's subscription to the LEDGER costs only one dollar. You get this fine family story paper every week for a year for the dollar, and you get six of these elegant patterns FREE, by subscribing now.

Select any six patterns—send the number and size of each, with one dollar to

PATTERN DEPT., CHICAGO LEDGER, CHICAGO, ILL.

Subscription for Canada $1.50 per year.

5622 SEVEN GORED SKIRT 24 TO 36 WAIST
5627 BOY'S OVERALLS 4 TO 8 YEARS
5619 FIVE GORED PETTICOAT 22 TO 32 WAIST
5675 MISSES' CHESTERFIELD COAT 14 AND 16 YEARS
5651 GIRLS' JUMPER DRESS WITH GUIMPE 4 TO 10 YEARS
5626 CHILDS DRESS 2, 4 AND 6 YEARS
5617 FIVE GORED SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST
5645 OVER BLOUSE WITH GIRDLE 32 TO 40 BUST
5632 BOYS' BLOUSE SUIT 6 TO 12 YEARS
5643 BLOUSE OR SHIRT WAIST 32 TO 44 BUST
5593 FITTED JACKET 36 TO 46 BUST
5636 GIRLS' DRESS 6 TO 12 YEARS
5620 SHIRT WAIST OR BLOUSE 32 TO 42 BUST
5602 BOYS' BLOUSE 4 TO 12 YEARS
5677 OVER BLOUSE OR JUMPER 32 TO 42 BUST
5637 FANCY YOKE BLOUSE 32 TO 42 BUST
5643 PRINCESSE JUMPER GOWN 32 TO 40 BUST
5641 CORSET COVER 34 TO 44 BUST
5628 GIRLS' COAT 4 TO 12 YEARS
5678 CAPE ETON 34 TO 42 BUST
5642 TUCKED FLOUNCE SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST
5637 GIRLS' DRESS 8 TO 14 YEARS
5624 ONE-PIECE MIMONO SMALL, MEDIUM, LARGE
5676 NINE GORED PLAITED SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST

MOONLIGHT AND MUSIC

The Shining Orb of the Night and Melodious Strains from Sweet Orchestras Make Summer a Continuous Dream of Joy and Pleasure.

Can you not thrilled with music, sweet melodic music, on a beautiful moonlight night? Nothing in this world so arouses the poetic instinct of men and women and nothing makes them so romantic as a combination of moonlight and music.

I want to tell you here how you may have the sweetest, the most tender music and ringing marches as well on every moonlight night this summer right on your own lawn or your own porch and it will cost you almost nothing compared with the pleasure that will be yours.

Joy for the Night

I know of no better way to spend the glorious evenings of summer than by listening to the wonderful music of a genuine Edison new style 1907 model phonograph, and for this reason I am glad to be able to place on this page full details of the great FREE TRIAL and easy-payment offer which is being made to every reader of this paper by the Edison Phonograph distributors of Chicago.

The editor of this paper is impressed by the fact that the new style 1907 model Edison phonograph is a truly wonderful machine. It does such a great variety of marvelous things—things almost beyond belief. The new style 1907 Edison phonograph is so far superior to the old style scratching imitations that you cannot imagine how sweet is the music from this marvelous new instrument. Don't form your opinion of the new style Edison by the scratching, grating machine you may have heard at public entertainments.

Whole Summer of Pleasure

Think of the joy that will be yours during the entire summer if you get an Edison phonograph on the easy-payment, free trial offer made on this page. I want you to read all about this marvelous offer because I want to have it so that you can command the music of the greatest entertainment you can imagine. Every afternoon, every evening, every holiday you may have in your own house, on the porch or on the lawn, the sweet toned Edison playing the finest opera selections, the greatest band and orchestra pieces, the best vocal music, amusing recitations and comic songs. The Edison gives you anything you like. You may have a band concert any time you wish and any time you desire. Think of what this means. Your home and your lawn will then be as popular as are the parks of the great cities on the nights when the band concerts take place.

Suppose you want an evening concert to please the most fastidious taste. You get up something like this:

Sample Program for Lawn Concert

8175	"Ave Maria" medley.....Vocal
9044	"Dream".....Tenor Solo
9422	"Man Behind the Gun," march.....Band
2490	"Holy City".....Violin Solo
8156	"In the Shade of the Old Apple Tree".....Vocal
4064	"Laughing Song".....Comic
1875	"Sweetest Story Ever Told".....Song
2501	"Annie Laurie".....Male Quartette
2145	"Courtship of Barney and Hilda".....Recitation
8154	"Thoroughbred," two-step.....Band
444	"Fifty Serenade".....Orchestra

Read What the Editor Says

The editor urges you to take advantage of the great offer made here today. Remember you can get an Edison for free trial and may pay for it either in cash or the smallest monthly payments. The Edison catalogue of phonographs, the catalogue of 15,000 records and the great Edison journal are all furnished free. You better order them at once. Don't take the time to write a letter. Merely sign the coupon at the bottom of the page, cut or tear it out and place it in a letter and mail.

LOOK at the happy May party with the joyful children and the parents applauding at the sight of the young merry makers dancing around the pole. All are enjoying the sweet music of the Edison Phonograph. The Edison Phonograph has indeed been rightly called the king of entertainers. Summer or winter its voice carries happiness and content. If you have heard only the old style machines or the rasping, scratching imitation machines heard at country fairs and the like you cannot imagine what a treasure of good cheer, what endless entertainment the new improved genuine Edison Phonograph can give all of your family. Read what Mr. Edison says. Read below how every responsible person can get a genuine Edison Phonograph on FREE TRIAL to be bought, if acceptable, either for cash or on the easiest monthly payments.

MR. EDISON says: "I Want to See a Phonograph in Every American Home."

Thomas A. Edison.

For the phonograph, as the reader may know, is the wizard's hobby. His telephone and telegraph inventions have passed into the hands of big stock companies, but the phonograph remains Mr. Edison's own. He has worked over it continuously so that today the new improved 1907 model genuine Edison Phonograph is a perfect musical instrument. You cannot realize its superiority until you have heard it and tried it yourself in your own home.

Thomas A. Edison.
TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

FREE TRIAL

Every responsible person is invited to a Free Trial of the new style improved 1907 model genuine Edison phonograph. Free trial means free trial. You pay us nothing—not one cent—no C. O. D. either. You take the instrument to your home and play all the beautiful Edison records—stirring band and orchestra records, the most laughable comic recitations, the latest songs, and up-to-the-minute hits. Let your family and friends hear the machine laugh—sing—talk—play. Then decide.—If you want to, you may return outfit at our expense—But—If you are more than pleased, if you decide to keep this king of entertainers—and we know you will—you have the choice of sending cash in full for the outfit or paying on the easiest possible payments—and the outfit bought on time costs you as little as if you paid cash in full.

The editor of this paper knows that this free trial offer is just as represented.

$2.00 A MONTH

now buys a genuine 1907 model Edison outfit including one dozen Nightingale finished genuine Edison records. The finest improved 1907 model Edison outfit only $2.00 a month. And at ROCK-BOTTOM PRICE, no matter whether you send the cash in full or pay on our easiest terms. Remember, no rock-bottom price on the finest improved Edison outfits—ONE-THIRD AND ONE-FOURTH THE PRICE OF DEALERS IN TOWNS.

This is a business proposition for business people. Every responsible person is invited to a free trial. Sign the coupon and get the Edison catalogue free postpaid.

For Cash in Full

So many cash buyers are sending for a free trial of our new 1907 model Edison that we are asked continuously what discount we can allow for cash. But as the prices which we name are already the prices for the rock-bottom patent, cash or time-payments, we must state once more that a cash discount is simply impossible.

GET THE MACHINE ON FREE TRIAL ANYWAY. Later you can decided whether you want to send cash in full or whether you prefer the easy payment plan, making the payments so very easy that you can hardly feel the monthly expenses.

No Money Down—No C. O. D.

THE GREAT EDISON OUTFIT No. 5

EDISON CATALOGS FREE

Sign this coupon and get the great Edison catalogs, the catalog of phonographs showing every style of Edison machines and the catalogs of 15,000 Edison records; also the magnificent circular of our new 1907 model Edison outfit No. 5. You will be surprised at the rock-bottom prices on the finest kind of talking machines. Get all these catalogs free, prepaid, and select the machine you want to try on free trial offer. Every responsible reader of this paper should sign this coupon. You need not bother with a letter. Just write your name and address plainly on the coupon and mail in an envelope. Sign coupon NOW.

CUT OR TEAR OUT THIS COUPON

Just Sign and Mail Coupon.

NO LETTER NECESSARY, THE COUPON WILL DO.

FREDERICK BABSON

Edison Phonograph Distributors

Edison Bldg., Suite 413 X, CHICAGO

Thomas A. Edison.